Getting it together

The agencies that failed the Roast Busters' victims might look to the Wairarapa to see how to do better in future.

Successive governments have preached the need for agencies to work together on complex social problems. Yet those we should be able to trust to collaborate to keep us safe too often revert to old habits.

The Independent Police Conduct Authority's condemnation of the police investigation into the so-called Roast Busters discloses chronic lack of co-ordination among investigative professionals. They simply did not pool vital information – even after the gang's abuse of young girls became a national public outrage. There are striking parallels here with the bureaucracies that once obstructed efforts to counter domestic violence and child abuse in the Wairarapa, as recounted in the Listener's recent story.

In the Roast Busters case, the schools that first reported concerns about the alleged sexual abuse of under-age girls spoke up swiftly and followed up to try to ensure action, but a subsequent lack of diligence among police and social agencies let the girls down. The police were up against understandable reluctance from some victims, and in some cases their families, to take things further. But there were literally no consequences for the boys, whose identities were not even accurately recorded in official files and who were not issued warnings.

Two boys were interviewed, but the interviews were ill-prepared for and inadequate. Nor did police persist with the investigation to the extent of finding out whether individual cases might be substantiated in court. A specially chilling instance was a young woman's complaint that one of the young men had assaulted her, continuing after she told him to stop. This was witnessed and confirmed to police by three others, two of them Roast Busters members, who said they physically intervened to stop the behaviour. Even then, no action. This leaves the awful likelihood that the boys might have been brought to justice to some extent had the police zeroed in on the evidence available.

The boys' exploits were proudly posted on social media. Yet, alarmingly, some of the girls involved did not seem to see their exploitation as troubling. Female peers of the boys interviewed on television said they still thought them "cool".

As always, parental inattention or neglect was a factor. And we can't overlook the persistent message of popular culture, that early sexualisation of young girls is desirable and status-enhancing.

The IPCA noted that familial influence, the youth of those involved, and the inevitable role of drugs, alcohol and peer pressure meant the case was too complex for the police alone to remediate.

But the flipside to this can be seen in the Wairarapa, where proactive and powerful community efforts following a slew of child murders mean relevant local agencies work together effectively, despite the complex dynamics of abuse. Violence Free Network Wairarapa shows collaboration between 12 agencies, including police, not only is possible, but can also be successful. Domestic violence has fallen as a result of twice-weekly multi-agency meetings at which local knowledge is shared and problems identified.

Crucially, a culture has developed within the Wairarapa police whereby incidents of family violence are treated as matters warranting sustained, long-term focus. Just as crucially, violent men in the Wairarapa can now attend programmes where they can confront their attitudes and behaviour.

The lesson here is that damaging attitudes – in the case of the Roast Busters, their sense of entitlement to sex and lack of empathy for their victims – can be turned around.

One of the disappointments of the IPCA report is that no one seems to have thought beyond the immediate issue to the longer-term possibilities. To that extent the report, like many of its kind, ends in a cul-de-sac.

Tough as the report is, it's hard to accept the IPCA's conclusion that the investigators were simply variously incompetent. There must be something else at play here for such comprehensive failure, for the police are not routinely incompetent.

The answer may lie, immeasurable by the IPCA, in police culture, where perhaps the ethnicity or social standing of those involved influenced the officers. It's fair to ask whether some misapplied notion of productivity – of the kind that invokes such suspicion about road safety policing – adversely affects such investigations.

Yet there was one heartening finding, which whistle-blower Louise Nicholas says shows the police have improved since her rape ordeal: the girls were treated with compassion and courtesy at all stages of the investigation. ■

Tough as the report is, it's hard to accept the conclusion that the investigators were simply variously incompetent.

Dying to die

Dr Rob Jonquière's recent visit has contributed to a greater understanding of how the law in the area of assisted dying and end of life choices works in the Netherlands and around the world, from both his personal experience as a doctor and political experience as an advocate ("Live & let die", March 21). He did, however miss one point about the bill that I, with others, drafted for New Zealand legislators when I was an MP.

It does in fact allow for it to be applied to those who have an irreversible mental or physical condition that causes the person unbearable suffering, by their own assessment – not a doctor's or a family member's assessment, but their own. This makes it much more like the Dutch law than Jonquière realised. In conversation with him after the Listener's interview appeared, he acknowledged this point.

My End of Life Choice Bill seeks to decriminalise the assisted dying of anyone with a terminal illness that is likely to end their life within the next 12 months, as well as those whose irreversible condition renders their life unbearable. It would allow those who have been autonomous, self-determining adults all their lives to be autonomous, self-determining adults at their end. No more and no less.

Maryan Street
(Hataitai, Wellington)

Dr Rob Jonquière would love to be able to provide everyone at "a certain age" with a lethal pill that they could take at their convenience when the going gets tough. A gift from the state. No messing around with laws. Imagine the death parties – what a man and what a vision!

David Richmond
(Stonefields, Auckland)

With all due respect, the young and even the middle aged have no idea about how old people feel about life, death and family.

Most offspring would hate the idea of their elders dying. They can't imagine it being painful to get out of bed every morning, the frustration of the body crapping out despite battles to remain fit or genuinely not wanting to be a burden (or to lose independence, the other side of that coin). In this information age, if we have a terminal illness we know in gory detail how horrible death from that illness can be, even with modern medical palliatives.

The great majority of us will not need or want to choose the right to die, but eventually, for a few, pain and disability can accumulate to the point where life may not be worth it. This brings us to the biggest misunderstanding between generations: the young, and the middle aged too, are unable to see that most old people are still perfectly capable of making this type of decision. They confuse bodily weakness and a bit of absent-mindedness with being doolally, and they don't see that the old want the right to be in charge of their own lives, even with some risk attached.

Yes, we should discuss death with our families and break the stiff-upper-lip silence that still predominates here, but we must also have the right to choose if the time comes when our quality of life has dipped too low. We don't make these decisions lightly or quickly.

SCIENCE-LITE DIET

The story about Michael Mosley's 5:2 diet ("The kindest cuts", March 21) is promoted on the Listener cover with the words "New research shows ...". The article in fact makes only scattered allusions to a few "studies", some of them only prospective, and relies heavily on Mosley's personal dietary experiments.

Meanwhile, Brian Clegg ("The facts of life", March 21) cautions against breathless journalistic hype that has little regard for the true quality of such ephemeral "findings". I would hope Clegg's important book is taken to heart.

Mark Graesser
(Nelson)

There's no question people would lose weight on Michael Mosley's diet. The essential question is: "How long can I keep doing this?" If this rigid fasting regime becomes too much and dieters stop, or the food denial triggers urges to eat unhealthily on non-fasting days, they would regain any lost weight and lose any health benefits.

This is the same question that should be asked about any diet or altered eating programme. Dieting's very high failure rate indicates few people seem to be asking it. Any altered eating programme will not improve health long term until that question is realistically answered.

WATCHING THE WATCHERS

We all owe Nicky Hager and Edward Snowden (Editorial, March 21) a debt of gratitude for making us aware of the existence of these huge databases of information. The problem is not with extracting relevant portions for security purposes, but with the other potential uses. I'm thinking of those who have a legitimate "need to know" but who are corrupted in some way either for commercial or political gain – for example, they may extract information for a company about a competitor for a major contract.

If such data is obtained by a straightforward user, this would be apparent from analysing computer logs. But there are many other users with system access rights for administration and other purposes. Some would be well placed to modify logs, introduce fake data or extract what they wanted either from the live database or backup copies.

The simple fact that Snowden has large chunks of the database in his possession demonstrates these are no idle fears. It is not only concern about personal freedom or persecution that should worry us but very real criminal and commercial issues.

Perce Harpham
(Lower Hutt)

The Listener holds that GCSB's mass of communications data collected from Pacific Island nations could be used "to watch out on their behalf for terrorists or criminals trying to establish a new beachhead".

The problem is that no Pacific Island government has given New Zealand permission to Hoover up all their communications and Tongan Prime Minister Akilisi Pohiva has expressed his concern.

Such objections will grow now it is revealed that GCSB specifically targeted the communications of the Solomon Islands Prime Minister's chief advisers, the Cabinet secretary and non-government actors such as anti-corruption campaigner Benjamin Afuga.

This follows earlier revelations that GCSB's Five Eyes partners have spied on the private communications of German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Brazil's President Dilma Rousseff and former Indonesian president Susilo Yudhoyono. In each case the leaders responded with justified anger.

Like spying over the generations, the Five Eyes spying is primarily concerned with gaining political and economic intelligence and using it to the advantage of the Five Eyes member states.

You say Nicky Hager can't expect our country to "listen with concern" until he can produce evidence that the GCSB's "political masters are misusing data". The Asian and Pacific leaders targeted by GCSB will not be so complacent about this breach of their privacy, or the manner in which the information obtained is used. The targeted nations don't always see eye to eye with Five Eyes members on political or economic policy and they know the intercepted data could be used against their countries' interests.

As a small country highly dependent on trade and good relations in the Asia-Pacific, being part of this Five Eyes communications dragnet is not in our national interest.

HUNDERTWASSER? REALLY?

If I were to do a painting inspired by a sketch done by Goldie and tried to sell it as a genuine Goldie, I would end up in jail, charged with fraud. Whangarei District Council ("Battle lines", March 28) is proceeding to do just that: promoting the proposed Hundertwasser art centre building as the last genuine design of the Austrian artist.

It's true, the original concept was based on a sketch on the back of an envelope, but it will be designed largely by Austrian architect Heinz Springmann, not by Hundertwasser himself.

The whole concept is diametrically opposed to the specific wishes of Hundertwasser in his famous Mould Manifesto of 1958 and addendum of 1964. He even called it an architectural crime to have an outsider design a building instead of the actual tenants.

FLAG WAVING

Your editorial on the New Zealand flag was spot on ("Symbol solution", March 28). I favour the Kyle Lockwood design that was at the top of your illustrated list. I've had one made and fly it regularly. Compelling reasons to change are:

1. The present flag is not distinctively identified with New Zealand.
2. Of 53 Commonwealth countries, only four (other than the UK) include the Union Jack in their national flag.
3. The similarity of the New Zealand and Australian flags confuses many people around the world, including a large proportion of Kiwis.
4. New Zealand is no longer as attached to the UK as when the flag was designed, to the extent that when entering the UK New Zealand passport holders now have to join the Aliens and Others queue.

The silver fern on a black background has had a lot of support but this is fast waning, not helped by associations with Islamic State. Lockwood's design retains both the silver fern and the Southern Cross.

It's a shame Hundertwasser's New Zealand flag, which could've settled matters ages ago, seems to have dropped out of the running. Quite unlike any other on the planet, with its clean, green simplicity

WHAT'S KILLING THE BIRDS

Fiona McQueen (Letters, March 28) infers that the use of 1080 in Fiordland has caused the lack of bird-song in the Routeburn and Hollyford Valleys. I lived in Te Anau in the early 1980s and was similarly shocked at the lack of birdsong in Fiordland National Park, well before the extensive use of 1080. The silence of the birds was because of the predation of stoats and possums.

Bring on the 1080 drops.

Until stoats and possums are eliminated, there will be no recovery of the bird population and no dawn chorus.

Bill Ralston is spot on with his description of Guyon Espiner and Susie Ferguson's style of reporting as "eviscerating".

How I long for the professionalism of Geoff Robinson, who knew better than to impose his own prejudices on his interviewees. He also had a mellifluous voice that was a pleasure to listen to in the morning.

I'm now waiting for the current presenters to just interview each other as they obviously feel that their personal opinions are very important to us.

Twilight zones

A government proposal to shut down remote settlements threatens much more than that.

Out west of Alice Springs on the red fringe of the Tanami Desert clings a flimsy, weary hamlet bounded by mulga wood and the ancient, purple folds of a low-rising stone range, Haasts Bluff. It's called Papunya and it's here that 1000 nomadic Aboriginal people – among the very last of the desert wanderers – were settled in the 1960s.

A meandering desert track covers much of the 250km from Alice Springs, its edges littered with beer cans and wrecks the road broke. The corrugated iron roofs of Papunya's shanties flash like signalling mirrors to travellers approaching in the blue heat. Wild, bored kids roam, the houses are crumbling and the white hospital the Whitlam Government built 40 years ago is sinking back into the desert.

When I last travelled that track a decade ago, it was as a newspaperman in search of a story to shock: an epidemic of petrol sniffing – the fumes fry brains and restrict the supply of oxygen to the blood – was taking the minds and lives of children. A white health worker concealed me and the photographer in a freezing hut; he'd be back at dawn to take us to the sniffers stumbling crazily in the half-light, cut-down plastic petrol containers pressed to their faces.

We listened as we waited that night to the noises of the strange, savage place: the mangy dogs, the quarrelsome drunks, the occasional far-off scream. And then, above that barren chaos, rose a pure, magnetic sound. It was a children's choir. The voices lingered in that lifeless air; they revealed that beauty, dreams and spirit lived on in that place. A music teacher could be heard talking gently, encouraging, praising. They sang for hours into the night.

Sleep did not come, not least because of the growing realisation that the petrol sniffers we'd meet at dawn were not the real story here.

This was the place to which curious young social studies teacher Geoffrey Bardon drove a rickety Volkswagen from Sydney in 1970. He studied the shapes and forms the old desert men, now broken and corralled, etched into the sand. He encouraged them to paint and so exploded the desert art movement, a great artistic and spiritual inferno of Aboriginal dot painting that gave luminous expression to the tribes.

The fabled Aboriginal rockers the Warumpi Band also rose out of this humiliated, repressed place in the 1980s, going on to record the first rock song in an Aboriginal language, Jailanguru Pakarnu (Out from Jail), in 1983. They toured the bush. And then Europe.

"Is the light bothering you?"

To know what of the human spirit can glow and rage within the filth, sadness and death of these twilight places is to understand why Australian Prime Minister Tony Abbott seemed to finally lose the inland Aboriginal people recently when he said those who live in remote communities are making "a lifestyle choice".

The Prime Minister was in Perth, lending his support to the Government of Western Australia's intention to shut down up to 150 of the state's 273 remote Aboriginal settlements, claiming – at the end of the country's longest-running economic boom – that it can no longer afford to supply them with health care, teachers and other support.

Something much bigger is stirring here: if Western Australia succeeds in shuttering its small Aboriginal settlements, other states, facing similar cost pressures, will surely be emboldened to follow.

There is only one place left for those forced out. They will end up in fresh hovels on the outskirts of larger inland towns – the new fringe dwellers, sleeping in river beds and parks, deadened by booze. The eruption out of that immense desert of glowing, arresting art and rock music that told Aboriginal stories will be only a memory. ■

Call of the wild ones

It’s hard to never fall foul of the internet’s namers and shamers.

In parts of the internet, “calling out” is as commonplace as pictures of kittens. “Call-out culture refers to the tendency among progressives, radicals, activists, and community organisers to publicly name instances or patterns of oppressive behaviour and language use by others,” explains Asam Ahmad in Canadian magazine Briar-patch. “People can be called out for statements and actions that are sexist, racist, ableist, and the list goes on.”

Too often, in forums such as Twitter or Facebook, this “particular armchair and academic brand of activism” entails a “public performance where people can demonstrate their wit or how pure their politics are”, writes Ahmad. It can become “easy to forget that the individual we are calling out is a human being”.

He even detects “a mild totalitarian undercurrent not just in call-out culture but also in how progressive communities police and define the bounds of who’s in and who’s out. More often than not, this boundary is constructed through the use of appropriate language and terminology – a language and terminology that are forever shifting and almost impossible to keep up with. In such a context, it is impossible not to fail at least some of the time.”

✚ “It is a campaign regarded as a heroic war of defence by Turks, but a catastrophe for Australians and New Zealanders,” notes Istanbul-based Sabah. One hundred years after the Battle of Gallipoli – known in Turkey as the Battle of Çanakkale – “commemorations demonstrate how the wounds of war can heal into friendships, as people from each side mourn together for a common purpose”, says the paper. In another Turkish daily, Hürriyet, columnist Yusuf Kanli commends visitors to the World War I battleground for helping to “convert a huge disaster for all into a joint commemoration, a source of binding friendship”. He writes: “If not for the great efforts of the Australians and New Zealanders who travel to Gallipoli by the tens of thousands every year to respect their fallen heroes, forcing the Gallipoli cemeteries to turn into some sort of ‘nationhood pilgrimage’, Turks would not have begun to pressure their governments to take care of the Turkish cemeteries, convert the battlegrounds of the Gallipoli Campaign into a national park and make the region easily accessible.”

✚ South by Southwest, the annual festival of music and interactive technology in Austin, Texas, is “a shell of what it was originally about”, writes Kyle Kramer at the music site Noisey. The accepted wisdom: “It’s overrun with brands grasping at any desperate measure to make people care about them, it’s not about the music any more and, worst of all, it’s not even cool.” Well, obviously, he adds – and the only way to enjoy it is by “giving in completely to the corporatised absurdity”. His appraisal, after boarding the hospitality gravy train (or plane, in fact): “SXSW is awesome.”

Writing in the Week, Emily L

Hauser finds the corporatised nature of the event deeply unawesome. SXSW had become not just “a corporate behemoth”, but “a huge, exploitative scam”. Organisers reap profits, argues Hauser, “on the backs of thousands of artists and volunteers who are in every meaningful sense unpaid”. The same liberal types who “take Walmart and McDonald’s to task for their labour practices” flock to SXSW uncritically, she argues. “Workers everywhere deserve fair recompense – a living wage, common decency, respect. Yet we seem oddly okay with the notion that creative work doesn’t deserve similar consideration.”

"She looks like a girl who would love a good kayak."

Daters gon' date

So much nail polish, so little dignity – the claws are out for the bachelor.

As Jane Austen might have observed had she lived in our enlightened times, a single man in possession of a Paleo food company and a set of ripped abs must be in want of a wife.

One man and an all-day buffet of women: The Bachelor NZ is a very simple, slightly Palaeolithic sort of set-up. Nevertheless, host Mike Puru is on hand to over-explain lest any of the participants imagine they're there to sing badly or build a luxury master en suite. The contestants, he declares, "are motivated by one desire and one desire only! To win the affection of the bachelor!"

Arthur seems a nice enough chap. He's apparently a model when he isn't running CleanPaleo, selling the sort of food cavemen would have eaten. Who knew Stone Age man found the time to concoct gluten-free, grain-free, dairy-free cereal?

On the CleanPaleo Facebook page, along with ominous articles – "Even your fruit salad is not what it seems," threatens one – there's evidence of something even more worrying: the Paleo sense of humour. See the photo showing a wardrobe footwear holder filled with lollies. "Life hack," reads the caption. "Use your shoe organiser to hold your candy after the diabetes takes your feet." Lol.

Back at the "mansion of love", a bunch of women in too-tight frocks are at each other's throats as they vie for Arthur's approval. It's like a vintage episode of Dynasty.

To counter any sense that these women are being exploited in any way, the show tends to cast Arthur as an antelope harmlessly grazing on the savannah while a pack of over-groomed carnivores circle. Somehow still in the running is Kristie, despite thinking it was a winning tactical move to bark, "Arthur! My glass is empty!"

He filled her glass. The only natural predators these ladies have are the battalions of crack journalists who have been assigned to trawl through their backstories hoping for drink-driving convictions.

The contestants may spend their days sitting companionably enough in the garden giving themselves manicures – after this series can peak nail varnish be far off? But forget the sisterhood. It's every bachelorette for herself.

"Chrystal kept flirting, which made me want to vomit," shared Danielle, who in Dynasty terms is Linda Evans to Chrystal's Joan Collins. "If I'm out swimming and there's a shark, I don't need to be faster than the shark, I just need to be faster than you," purred Chrystal, in case her housemates were in any doubt about her commitment to the Darwinian dynamics of reality show romance.

It was left to Rosie – "She's crazy!" – to disrupt the first purge of the mansion of love by dumping Arthur before he had a chance to dump her. Rosie was the real estate agent who, in her spare time, enjoys being shot at in the Middle East. "I'd like to go out with a sniper, possibly," she mused. She was initially impressed with the bachelor's physique – "I want tall babies" – but Arthur's idea of living dangerously involves eating refined carbohydrates. Their love was not to be. Rosie left the mansion. Oh dear. Never mind. More for everyone else.

You can tell yoga instructor Poppy doesn't really stand a chance among this lot, though she's dead keen. "I'm off like a rat up a drain!" she confessed, when the bachelor issued a summons. But the most romantic thing he's said about her so far is "She looks like a girl who would love a good kayak".

Still, if she fails to get one of those crappy roses, Poppy will walk away with her head held high, having achieved stardom beyond most contestants' wildest dreams. Her rebellious bodily functions, resistant to any ritualised reality show narrative, made headlines in the New York Post after she farted on her first date. My giddy aunt. Top that, Chrystal. ■

TIM MOBILISES THE TROOPS

Invercargill is hoping to help pay for a museum in honour of Le Quesnoy's Kiwi liberators, says Mayor Tim Shadbolt. by SALLY BLUNDELL

They came from "the Uttermost Ends of the Earth", the New Zealand soldiers who succeeded in liberating the small French village of Le Quesnoy on November 4, 1918, and today are commemorated on a plaque in the historic walled town.

Now the southern city most deserving of that description is backing moves for a permanent museum dedicated to the actions of the 3rd (Rifle) Brigade that day and the efforts of all New Zealanders who served in two world wars.

"With all the commemorations of World War I, it seems an opportunity to do something very special and that seems to be a town we should be focusing on," says Invercargill Mayor Tim Shadbolt. "I've been up the Somme valley and what upset me was trying to find the New Zealand war graves. There were Irish, Canadian – everyone else had a big sign, but I had to ask people in France [where the New Zealand graves were], which is always a tricky manoeuvre."

He finally found the New Zealand memorial at the Caterpillar Valley Cemetery in Longueval – "a little town off beaten track".

The Le Quesnoy council has already offered New Zealand a large stately 19th-century building on a 10,600sq m piece of land close to the town centre for the venture, at an affordable and – says Herb Farrant, secretary of the New Zealand Memorial Museum Trust behind the scheme to establish a permanent museum there – negotiable $2.1 million. A further $9 million would be required for refurbishment and fitting out, but he says the sale of nine existing residential buildings on the site would more than cover the cost of the land.

A relatively cheap venture, says Shadbolt, to honour a purely New Zealand victory and those who died in the war. He says a local museum reserve fund of $3 million, currently on hold as Invercargill contends with the burgeoning cost of rebuilding the city's stadium, could be used as a loan or seed grant.

"There are so many options to raise what seems like such a small amount of finance for such a memorable occasion.

It's worth celebrating – and [Le Quesnoy] is the only place where they're celebrating us. It should be a pilgrimage – more so than Gallipoli, which was an absolute tragedy, whereas this was such a military victory."

For Shadbolt, there is also a mayoral link. During World War I, the building on offer, currently in use as the gendarmerie, was the residence of Le Quesnoy Mayor Achille Carlier, later accused by the Germans of hiding wounded French and British troops and siphoning food from the occupying force.

"When the Germans came in [to Le Quesnoy], they requisitioned all the food supplies – took over bakeries and butcheries and ignored the population of about 3000," says Farrant. "Achille Carlier arranged for bakers to do things on the side without the Germans knowing."

"I've been up the Somme valley and what upset me was trying to find the New Zealand war graves."

SOUTHLAND'S MANY FALLEN

Southland paid a heavy price in the war. In 1914, a volunteer force of 227 infantry and 160 mounted riflemen and horses left for the Front. Over the following four years, this figure rose to just over 5000.

Clockwise from left: the liberation of Le Quesnoy; the building offered as a museum; Southland Boys' High, which lost 98 pupils in WWI; Mike Pettit; Le Quesnoy Mayor Marie-Sophie Lesne; Tim Shadbolt.

The Southland contingent served as part of the Otago Infantry Regiment, known as the Unlucky Otagos for their involvement in some of the bloodiest battles of the war and for suffering more casualties than any other regiments in Messines, Passchendaele and the final March to Victory of 1918. "In line with rest of country, about 18% were killed and 40% wounded," says Southland military historian Aaron Fox.

Of the 430 young men from Invercargill who went to fight, 98 did not return. Southland Boys' High School lost almost an entire school roll. At the outbreak of World War I, the school had 118 pupils. By the end of the war, 103 former pupils had died in combat.

On September 28 last year, almost 400 Southlanders boarded a train from Invercargill to Dunedin on a sell-out pilgrimage retracing the steps of soldiers heading to World War I from Port Chalmers 100 years previously.

This legacy is also inscribed in the region's landscape. "We are full of war memorials," says Fox. "Over 400 memorials and other structures, mainly from World War I – everything from school halls to horse troughs."

The vast majority of those commemorated were killed or wounded on the Western Front. "Everyone focuses on Gallipoli but we don't understand that the big battles where [many] relatives served or were wounded or killed occurred later in the war," says Fox. "Most of the people I talk to had relatives at Passchendaele in 1917 – few had relatives at Gallipoli – but people can't necessarily spell Passchendaele, let alone find it on the map."

FRANCE IS WHERE THE ACTION WAS

Despite the fixation with Gallipoli, he says our World War I imagery is concentrated on France. "What is on our collective consciousness is that imagery of a blasted landscape, waterlogged land and mass destruction – that's Passchendaele.

"But while we celebrate Katherine Mansfield at Menton, we don't know how to celebrate or commemorate the First World War by letting people experience a legacy – and the legacy we left at Le Quesnoy is intact."

Shadbolt has some persuading to do. The Southland Times awarded the Mayor "full marks for fearlessness" but described the project as "un idée horrible". But the Mayor is confident other councils will back the plan. He has raised the subject with Local Government New Zealand to see what support can be found on a national level.

"So they will be considering it. Even if it is just seen as a loan from our museum and we'll fund-raise with other councils to get it going. The main thing is to buy the building as quickly as we can so the deal is done."

Cambridge, Le Quesnoy's sister city, is already behind the project. Mike Pettit, chairman of the Cambridge Community Board of the Waipa District Council, says the board will be putting in a submission for funding for the museum to the council's long-term plan. ■

All the LONELY PEOPLE

Everyone experiences loneliness, but as you get older it can be more difficult to stave off, with potentially devastating consequences. by SALLY BLUNDELL

He was still in his pyjamas. While others in Ward 17 were dressed, waiting for their discharge papers, the elderly man in the tartan dressing gown had another night in hospital. He was in no hurry, he said. He lived alone. His daughter lived 40 minutes' drive away and visited only once a fortnight. At least in hospital there was someone to talk to.

"In our globalised world, that man is reasonably representative of the older population in New Zealand," says Age Concern NZ chief executive Robyn Scott. "Post the global financial crisis, we've become very concerned with vulnerable families and at-risk youth, but outside of dementia care, older people have gone off everybody's radar. But loneliness is an important issue for older people. The tipping point seems to be around the 80 mark – that's when people tend to become even more lonely or less able to do the things they were able to do before."

Everyone experiences loneliness. According to the 2010 General Social Survey, the most vulnerable to that pang of perceived social or emotional isolation are young adults aged 15-29 years. But behind the drawn curtains, in the glow of the TV, in a crowded rest home or a single-person house, a large number of older New Zealanders are feeling acutely socially, emotionally and/or physically alone.

The New Zealand Longitudinal Study of Ageing (NZLSA) reports that 41% of 50- to 84-year-olds are moderately lonely. Of these 10% – about 50,000 people – report being severely or very severely lonely. These findings match those from overseas. In the UK, about 10% of the population over 65 – over 900,000 people – is lonely all or most of the time. Nearly 20% of those living alone have no human contact on a typical day.

Why such figures? Those spoken to for this story point to increasing longevity, dispersed families and a general decline in inter-generational living. Others talk of a pervasive culture of possessive individualism, a myopic focus on youth. Others again blame high fences, rough footpaths, the demise of the corner dairy.

Although new subdivisions on the edges of Auckland and Christchurch are appearing fully equipped with family-friendly parks and playgrounds, what has fallen off the plans is the community centre, the convenient bus stop and the local shop where you might chat to the owner.

"I help this old fellow cross the road because he goes to the same dairy every Saturday morning," says Stephen Neville, from Massey University's School of Nursing. "That would be his only social contact for the day."

And many neighbourhoods, says Scott, are almost empty during the day. "So the traditional opportunities where people might have interacted in the past – at the letter box or the washing line, queuing up at the Post Office – don't exist any more."

PERNICIOUS COCKTAIL OF RISK

In a spacious and spotlessly clean brick house in suburban Christchurch, Peggy Garnett, 87, is bright, chatty. The lawn is mowed, the garden tended, the delicate tea set used for bridge games long past carefully laid out on a tray.

"When I used to garden, I'd see people, but I don't work in the garden any more. I sit here, read the paper, do the dishes. I do watch a lot of TV."

She has her routine: daily phone calls with her sister, grocery shopping on Wednesday ("I feel people are friendly"), the Probus club once a month, a fortnightly trip in the Age Concern van to a cafe or garden centre.

But many of her neighbours have gone. Friends – four last year – have died. Her nieces and nephews take her out, "but they have their own lives". Standing around is difficult, the step to her back door is a challenge.

"The last two winters I found a bit lonely. Getting around is hard and I don't want another fall. But you have to keep making the effort. Everybody feels lonely sometimes, but you have to do something."

No one is immune to loneliness, but old age tends to bring a pernicious cocktail of risk factors. According to Age UK, older people are more likely to experience

"People who are in hardship report being more lonely than people who are well off."

Loneliness can be a killer

No one is immune to that hollow ache of loneliness. Regardless of age, gender, ethnicity or marital status, it is a hurdle we all, at some stage in our lives, have to recognise and surmount. But recent research at Brigham Young University in Utah suggests that a pervasive perception of loneliness – as opposed to actual isolation – does affect physical health.

Based on 70 studies undertaken between 1980 and 2014, the researchers found that the effects on health of loneliness and social isolation are as great or greater than those of obesity and should be regarded as a serious threat.

Loneliness or living alone seem to be particularly bad for adults under the age of 65, presumably because, research suggests, solitary middle-aged adults are more likely to engage in risky behaviours and are less likely to seek medical treatment. According to study authors Julianne Holt-Lunstad and Tim Smith, affluent nations have the highest rates of individuals living alone, and as this number increases, social isolation will reach epidemic proportions in the next two decades.

Previous research by Holt-Lunstad and Smith put the heightened risk of mortality from loneliness at the same level as smoking 15 cigarettes a day and being an alcoholic. This more recent study suggests that not only is the risk of mortality in the same category as these well-known risk factors, but it also surpasses health risks associated with obesity.

loneliness if they are over 80, live alone, belong to an ethnic minority, are gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgender, or have poorer health than expected and/or a disability.

Men report higher rates of loneliness than women – as Scott says, women tend to have wider social networks than men – and Pacific and Asian people tend to be lonelier than other ethnic groups.

Income also makes a difference. “People in severest hardship or even people who are relatively comfortably off report being more lonely than people who are well off,” says Massey University psychology professor Fiona Alpass. “If you are poor, you have fewer resources to get out or have a computer to contact your family.”

For many, loneliness is triggered by key events: the death of a spouse, the loss of a driver’s licence, a neighbourhood scare, even a fall.

“There are all the [physical] implications to do with that fall,” says Age Concern Canterbury chief executive Simon Templeton. “But then there is often a loss of confidence, which means not going out so much. That can be a slippery slope.”

There is also the sudden change of location. In Christchurch, many people had to change suburbs following the earthquake. “So people were having to move away from their social connections, their church, the dairy down the road where they bought bread and milk every day.”

Three years ago, in the wake of the Christchurch earthquake of 2011, the South Shore Residents Association surveyed 500 local households to gauge their needs. More important than water and insurance advice, says chairman Bill Simpson, was the loss of “bumping into” places.

“Almost all were feeling isolated. We used to have a neighbourhood pub, the fish and chip shop, a cafe – they’ve gone. There’s no school, no church. [Local residents] are not on Facebook or Twitter.”

The association established a drop-in facility for coffee, a chat, a weekly game of mah-jong. On a Wednesday morning, there are volunteers from Red Cross; a depression support worker offers confidential advice. For the three women relaxing over a cup of tea, it’s about strengthening roots, feeling safe, re-establishing a sense of community.

For others, the response to old age or simply retirement is to leave altogether – to a new life by the sea, a new city close to children, a new home in a new subdivision. A move, says Alpass, that some later regret. “You finally get somewhere and there is not the support as you age and people are quite mobile with their work. You might go there at 65, but when you are 75, who will be looking after you?”

For older migrants this sense of alienation is even more acute.

“Often children think it is the best thing to do,” says Templeton. “Dad has died, let’s bring Mum over so she won’t be sad and lonely. So they move her over here. They’re busy at work, she’s in a country where she doesn’t speak the language, has no friends.”

“Scammers abuse them, scare them or groom them. Dating romance scams offering online friendship are a real shocker.”

In his work with older Chinese migrants, Auckland psychiatrist Dr Sai Wong describes a debilitating combination of loss of friends, loss of language and loss of culture. “People are proud of their culture in their home of origin. They come here and find it is not the same; they have nothing to hang on to. But they are ashamed to say they are lonely; they are worried people will blame their children.”

AS DAMAGING TO HEALTH AS SMOKING

Investing in social opportunities for older people cannot be dismissed as a “nice to have”, says Alpass. “What we see from health outcomes [is that] services to ameliorate issues around loneliness are critical to keep people out of hospitals and GP surgeries – the more expensive end of dealing with older people.”

According to Age UK, loneliness in old age is as damaging to health as smoking 15 cigarettes a day and twice as damaging as obesity. High blood pressure, cardiovascular disease, cognitive decline and anxiety all become more prevalent when social connections fall away. The lonely are more at risk of drinking too much, smoking, overeating, gambling (older women in particular are gambling in increasing numbers) and being depressed. Ministry of Health figures show an extraordinary 15-20% of people over 65 are affected by depression.

It's a challenge on all fronts. Older people may find it difficult to talk about emotions, particularly if they have grown up with the social stigma attached to mental illness or are worried how such a diagnosis may affect their independence. And family members, even GPs, may assume that downheartedness or general crankiness is an inevitable part of ageing.

"Older people do seek help," says University of Auckland psychiatry lecturer Gary Loneliness in old age is as damaging to health as smoking 15 cigarettes a day and twice as damaging as obesity.

Cheung. "They go to their GP, but they don't necessarily talk about their feelings." In analysing 200 suicide cases among those over-65, he found 70% had seen a GP within a month of their death.

Provisional suicide figures for the year to June 2014 from the Chief Coroner's office show that 29 people aged 80 or over took their lives. Of these, 24 were men, the highest rate per 100,000 population of any other age group in New Zealand.

In his study, Cheung found three main predictors: depression, self-reported health problems and perceived loneliness. Personality plays a factor, as does community and family support, but he says there is a clear need for a specific strategy for older people, including stronger screening and treatment of depression in primary care.

Any strategy to reduce social isolation will also have a cost benefit. Those struggling with loneliness clock up more doctor visits and more days in hospital. In the UK, at least one in 10 visits by older people to their

GP appears to be motivated by social isolation. Emergency services report that elderly people may call just to have someone to talk to.

Lonely older people are also more vulnerable to scams, losing anything up to a reported $850,000 to callers offering prizes, money and friendship by phone, mail, computer or door-to-door encounters. "Scammers are cold-calling, ringing up, becoming friends, making all sorts of promises," says BNZ security and fraud coordinator Bronwyn Groot.

The problem is not naivety but loneliness, she says. Older victims are vulnerable because they are isolated. "And scammers know that. They abuse them, scare them or groom them. Dating romance scams offering online friendship are a real shocker."

Groot takes her Scam-Savvy presentation to community groups across the country. "I say it's okay to hang up the phone, delete emails, say no to someone at the door. People have to be suspicious. I recommend people stop and wait, ring someone before they go ahead with it."

And if they have been sucked in, speak up. "Often they're ashamed. They're scared of what their family might think or that their kids might take their chequebook or force power of attorney. And that is very worrying."

REST HOMES NO PANACEA

Last year Peggy Garnett went to see a two-room apartment in a retirement village. "I was a wee bit down and lonely and thought it would be lovely but I don't think I want to leave my home. I love my home. I have all my bits and pieces that I've had all my life. It's nice to stay with your memories."

Her curiosity is not unusual. Loneliness has been found to almost double the likelihood of an older person entering residential care.

But rest homes are not a panacea for loneliness. Although there is more opportunity for social contact, says Alpass, if you lack mobility or resources, "it's going to be harder for you to make social contacts".

The Mental Health Foundation in the UK claims that depression affects one in five older people living in the community and two in five living in care homes. "People have this idea they will go into residential care and they'll be with all of these people and not be lonely," says Templeton. "But they go there and suddenly they're sharing lounges, they're having meals when they are told to have meals – they lose so much of their autonomy."

It is much worse if the move is not the older person's choice, he says. "Cognitive impairment aside – and there is a process for that – if you are making decisions for them, that is elder abuse."

Templeton talks of "dignity of risk ... Older people have the right to make poor choices. We get families saying Mum has to go into care because she might fall at home and if she does she will lie on the floor for three days – that is about their concern. We talk to [the mother], we say there is a risk of falling and we can get you a walking frame, but she might say, 'I know that but I want to stay at home.' Yes, there is a risk she could fall over and die – I could go home tonight and drink four bottles of whisky and die. It is the choice we make."

As with other OECD countries, New Zealand is committed to ageing in place, supporting older people to remain in their own homes or in supported accommodation of some type in the community, rather than moving into residential care. But in doing that, says Templeton, we need to be thinking about ways we connect with older people, "so they can thrive in a community".

THE SOCIAL NETWORKS

Around the country, Age Concern runs weekly van outings for over-65s to go to a venue or event or simply meet at one of their houses for morning tea. It also runs a one-on-one weekly visiting service to older housebound people that is staffed by volunteers, half of them over 65. "Some older people have days, weeks, not talking to anybody. Often that [Age Concern] visitor is the only person not paid to come and see them."

In 2002 Age Concern Otago in conjunction with the University of Otago pioneered Steady As You Go (Saygo). Designed as a peer-led falls-prevention exercise class, it was found to provide not only important physical benefits but also vital social connections. Such has been the success of the programme that Saygo courses are now rolling out across the country.

"Some older people have days, weeks, not talking to anybody. Often that [Age Concern] visitor is the only person not paid to come and see them."

Church groups, Neighbourhood Support groups and residents' associations are all working, usually on a shoestring budget, to re-establish meaningful social networks for the elderly in their communities.

For the past six years, in the last weekend in March, communities around the country have celebrated Neighbours Day, established in 2001 by Neighbours Day Aotearoa to encourage people to get together for a barbecue, a street makeover, a beer or a cup of tea as a catalyst for connecting or re-connecting neighbours with neighbours.

Last year entrepreneurs Casey Eden and Shane Bradley launched the Neighbourly website and app, an online bush telegraph aimed at fostering a community feeling for neighbourhoods through a local and secure listing service for events and activities, be it a garage sale or community sausage sizzle. Today it has more than 60,000 members in 1400 suburbs.

Around the country some 17,000 retirees are enrolled in SeniorNet programmes,

Technology is not the answer, says Templeton, but it is an answer to an increasing problem. "As the population of that age doubles, we will struggle to double our service, so we need to come up with other ways. Some people will need face to face [contact]. For others Skype is perfect."

Many – currently nearly a quarter of over-65s – will continue in paid employment. "A farm labourer might not want to be still working at 70," says Templeton, "but as the population ages and the workforce decreases, there won't be enough nurses, taxi drivers or burger flippers. There just won't be enough people to man the pumps."

FLEXIBLE APPROACHES

We are an ageing population. By the late 2030s, close to a quarter of us will be flashing our SuperGold Cards. The number of single-person households is increasing generally but most dramatically in the over-65 age group. According to Alpass, we will be living longer in, say, widowhood "and many There's two ways around that – immigration and people working longer."

Which may mean less demanding work and more flexible hours. "It is about workplaces valuing [older people's] input."

More flexible forms of housing are also in demand. Across the world new models are being established to cater to the growing number of single or widowed elderly people wanting to live independently but not alone. The Golden Girls Network in the US runs a database for members seeking compatible housemates. In the Netherlands, the Humanitas Apartments for Life challenges the inevitability of nursing homes with age-friendly housing developments that include restaurants, shops and other services so older residents can live as they choose in a social and supported environment.

In New Zealand, the Bays Community Housing Trust in Auckland runs two five-bedroom houses for women over 65 with limited assets. Around the country, the Abbeyfield model provides homes staffed by a cook-housekeeper that have a communal lounge, dining room and kitchen. Basically, flatting for ageing baby boomers.

Massey's Neville talks about age-friendly communities and more integrated neighsector of our population, Templeton is calling for more involvement of older people in planning decisions. "There is a requirement for every government body or organisation to have a statement relating to the Treaty of Waitangi, and that's important, but I'd like the same thing to be mandated for old people. For every change, every decision, every plan, there has to be a statement about how is this going to effect older people? What have we done to consult with them?"

It is a whole of society challenge, he says, and a whole of society responsibility.

"Our children don't stay in the same city; family members live all over the world. So when older people require some support, families aren't in a position to do that. And you often hear, 'My son lives in [the same city] but he is so busy with his own life.' As a society we need to take a look at that. This is not just about old people. It's about the whole continuum of us looking after and supporting each other. It is a two-way street, and the benefits to society are huge."

NEW LEASE OF LIFE

"I'm not that kind of person." Now on Tuesdays she helps prepare vegetable boxes and on Wednesdays she's on lunch duty. "I knew I had to do something with my life. I've got friends in a similar position, but they just can't make the effort. Here I'm meeting different people and I go home feeling good about myself. There's no point in looking at four walls all day, and you can't keep going out because that costs money. But this has given me a new lease of life." ■

REGIME MADNESS

The war on a drugs is an abject failure, says author Johann Hari, who is pushing the benefits of decriminalising most illicit substances. by GUYON ESPINER

Johann Hari has declared war on the war on drugs. The British author and journalist says the current approach just increases the harm by treating the problem as a chemical one. It punishes users, which then boosts the chance they will become addicts – yet most people who use these chemicals don't get addicted.

"The one thing we can say from the century-long war on drugs is that we gave it a fair shot. The US government spent a trillion dollars. It turns out we can't even keep drugs out of prisons, when you've got a walled perimeter and you pay people to walk around it the whole time, so good luck keeping them out of New Zealand or Britain or America."

Hari is most effusive about the position adopted in Portugal, which decriminalised nearly all drugs at the turn of the century. According to some analysis, drug use in Portugal has halved under the rules, which allow adults to buy small amounts of drugs, including cocaine, heroin and hashish.

In the week we speak, British Deputy Prime Minister Nick Clegg and business tycoon Richard Branson urge the UK to follow the Portuguese model. Hari wants drug use treated as a health issue rather than being judged as a moral issue in which addicts are corrupt individuals who get what is coming to them.

"I thought about this when Amy Winehouse died," he tells me on the phone from New York. "Quite a few kids I know, like teenagers, said things like, 'Well, she put it on herself.' These are nice kids and it really struck me that, wow, they have really picked this up from a culture that says when an addict dies you blame the addict. I can't think of any other minority where those kids, if a member of them died, would say, 'Well, they deserved it.' You could be a very extreme homophobe and if Elton John died it would be quite shocking if they said, 'Well,

"The vast majority of people's experience with drugs is positive. Why else would people take them?" – Johann Hari

I'm glad he died, he brought it on himself."

Hari has outlined his arguments in his latest book, Chasing the Scream: The First and Last Days of the War on Drugs. Part of the controversy that will inevitably accompany this book is the breaking of taboos, which even in permissive society still exist around drugs. Drugs can be fun. Yes, lethal and tragic in some cases. But sometimes fun too. Why else would people take them?

"The vast majority of people's experience with drugs is positive," Hari says, citing United Nations data he interprets as meaning 90% of drug use is "non-problematic".

But exactly what legal structure should be used to control the more dangerous drugs he's not so sure. Crack and P worry him. "These drugs are harmful to lots of people. Nobody disputes that," he writes. "Most of the banned drugs are closer to alcohol with its massive harms than they are to marijuana."

THE FIRST SHOTS

If humans have been consuming substances to alter consciousness for thousands of years, then why in the 20th century did we vow to rid the world of drugs? And who started the war on drugs anyway? Hari reckons he has it nailed down to one man.

Harry Jacob Anslinger was the head of the US Federal Bureau of Narcotics for a staggering 33 years, beginning in 1930. Before that he was the assistant commissioner for prohibition. Hari lays out the story of a man who, seeing the battle for alcohol prohibition was lost, fights to keep his tenuous bureaucracy alive. He finds an ally in the press, eager for sensational stories that now seem comic. “Mexican Family Go Insane,” the New York Times headlines a story about a widow and her four children who ate a marijuana plant. The story explains that there is no hope for the children and the mother “will be insane for the rest of her life”.

After a search of Anslinger’s papers held at Penn State University, Hari paints him as a hardline conservative who warned that marijuana “turns man into a wild beast” and makes black men forget their place and lust after white women. For Anslinger, the epicentre of this depravity was the jazz clubs, which were “like the jungles in the dead of night”. He and his agents went after the jazz greats, including Thelonious Monk, Charlie Parker and Louis Armstrong. But most of all, they pursued Billie Holiday, a heroin addict who was effectively harassed to death, to the extent she was arrested in a raid on her room as she fought for her life in hospital.

Hari says that all through this time, Anslinger was waging a PR war as part of his war on drugs and that tapping into racial prejudice was a big part of that. “He’s very good at taking those kind of electrical sparks that are in the air and building a lightning conductor over his department and saying, ‘Look, the solution to these fears and anxieties is to ban these chemicals and these drugs.’” Hari also believes that Anslinger’s prescience about the growing power of the mafia in the US gave him a dangerous level of confidence. “It’s hard for us to get our heads around now, but in the early 20th century ... the mafia was seen as a conspiracy theory the way we would see crazy bullshit like 9/11 Truthers or something. The tragedy of it is that he believes he is fighting the mafia but he is actually transferring a massive industry to them.”

Which leads to another great question: who was the first drug dealer? Hari reckons it was American gangster Arnold Rothstein. Anslinger unwittingly handed him a lucrative black market and he cashed in, buying off police and politicians along the way until he was shot and killed in 1928 by an unknown assassin.

“This was the bullet at the birth of drug prohibition and nobody knows where it came from even now,” Hari writes. “It is like the bullet that claimed the Archduke Ferdinand at the start of the First World War:

The assassination of Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria at the start of World War I.

the first shot in a global massacre.”

So, yes, the book seems overwritten in places. Hari compares the war on drugs with World War I again in the book’s conclusion, saying both began in 1914. “The First World War lasted four years ... miles of men killing and dying to seize a few more meters of mud. The drug war has lasted ... for almost one hundred years. I am trying now to imagine its victims laid out like the dead of that more famous war, consecrated in one vast graveyard.”

But don’t let the passages of purple prose put you off, because Hari makes some com-PELLING arguments in this book. Having introduced us to Anslinger and Rothstein, he says they are forever being replaced by harder versions of themselves. “The key players in the war continue to be either Anslingers or Rothsteins – the prohibitionist and the gangster locked together in a tango unto the far horizon.”

DISAPPOINTMENT WITH NZ

Hari is complimentary about New Zealand’s pioneering approach to legal highs but then deflated to learn that the Government backtracked after a media storm and the accompanying moral panic and has effectively banned synthetic drugs. Having raised the bar so high as to prevent the products coming onto a regulated open market, stories are already emerging about gangs selling synthetic cannabis on the black market.

“I find that really dismaying,” says Hari, who argues that one of the benefits of a regulated market is that drugs are less likely to be sold to under-18s. “We don’t have a choice about whether people are going to use drugs. We have a choice about whether that market is controlled by armed criminal gangs, who cause horrific violence and mayhem and massively endanger the users, or whether it is controlled by doctors and pharmacists.”

And indeed that is what used to happen. Hari writes that until cocaine and heroin were banned in the US in 1914, they were sold as remedies or “little helpers”, including Mrs Winslow’s Soothing Syrup, which contained 65mg of pure morphine in every ounce.

He says the drug war waged by Anslinger saw more than 20,000 doctors arrested in the US for prescribing opiates to patients, despite the 1914 law providing an exemption for doctors to do so. "The fact that they had to arrest 20,000 doctors because they insisted on carrying on prescribing to addicts astonished me and it's amazing that this history was successfully erased from popular consciousness."

THE NATURE OF ADDICTION

Perhaps the most challenging aspect of Hari's book for many readers will be his handling of addiction. Essentially he claims that it is not exposure to powerful drugs that leads to addiction, rather that people who are damaged, isolated and vulnerable before they start drugs are the ones who become addicted. This will be challenged by some health professionals and probably by many who say their loved ones have had their lives ruined by drugs.

Hari lays out the common belief. "If you and I and the next 20 people who walk past your office all use heroin together for 20 days, on day 21, because there are chemical hooks in the heroin, our bodies would physically need the heroin, we would be physically craving it and we'd all be addicts."

But, he asks, if opiates are so addictive, then why doesn't your grandmother become a junkie when prescribed diamorphine for her hip operation? "There are people being given heroin at a hospital near you for quite a long period of time. What is striking is that if what we think about addiction is right, those people should leave hospital as addicts. That almost never happens. You will have noticed that your grandmother was not turned into a junkie by her hip operation."

Why do a relatively small number of people who use drugs get addicted to them? He cites one study claiming that 20% of US soldiers in Vietnam were using heroin but that 95% of them "simply stopped" within a year of returning home, many without assistance. No war, misery and loneliness – no need to take hard drugs, or so goes his argument.

Hari says that the messages lapped up in drug education mostly come from a single source, because 90% of the global research into illegal drugs is funded by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, founded by Robert Dupont.

REHABILITATION OF A DIFFERENT KIND

Near the end of our discussion, Hari tells me he doesn't want to consume the drugs he one of his earliest memories, that of trying in vain to wake a relative from a drugged stupor. He writes that ever since, he's been "oddly drawn to addicts and recovering addicts – they feel like my tribe".

One senses the book is also about rehabilitation of a different kind. Hari is trying to rescue his reputation as a writer. He has won a string of journalism prizes but was forced to hand back his Orwell Prize in 2011 after he was found to have committing plagiarism. "What I did was, I sometimes, where I interviewed people, used things that they had said in their books, or in a small number of cases said to other journalists, as if they had been said directly to me, which was obviously completely wrong and a terrible thing to do.

"When you f--- up you should pay a big price, which I did, rightly, and you should very methodically show that you've not done the same thing again." Hence this book is meticulously footnoted and the website, chasingthescream.com, contains full audio copies of the interviews that quotes are drawn from and has a section for corrections and clarifications.

The start of the war on drugs: celebrations in the US to mark the end of prohibition.

argues should be legal for adults. Nowadays he limits himself to the occasional glass of wine. He did come to his subject matter with personal experience though: a family history of drug addiction and his own period of abusing narcolepsy drugs to fuel marathon writing binges. Hari opens his book with

"The tragedy of it is that he believes he is fighting the mafia but he is actually transferring a massive industry to them."

THE END OF THE WAR

It's time to wind up our call but Hari has a final sales pitch, a parting shot: he wants people who despise drug use to join the fight. "Ending the drug war is not about liking or approving of drugs. You can be militantly anti-drugs and against this crazy policy that makes addiction worse, empowers criminal gangs and wastes billions upon billions of dollars that we can spend on better things."

But he is optimistic the drug war is coming to an end – in some cases where it started, with several American states legalising marijuana.

He ends the book describing sitting in a late night meeting in Colorado listening to a soccer mum agonise about the appropriate labelling and licensing regime for hash cookies. Maybe the drug war will end with a whimper rather than a bang. ■

The rights choice

A Wellington woman's legal bid for assisted dying is likely to force MPs to confront the issue. by REBECCA MACFIE • photo by HAGEN HOPKINS

I do not want to die slowly, piece by piece. I do not want to waste away unconscious in a hospital bed. I do not want to die wracked with pain."

The woman who uttered these words was Gloria Taylor, a British Columbian with motor neurone disease, a condition that would gradually deprive her of the ability to walk, chew, swallow, speak and – eventually – breathe. She knew the consequences of her diagnosis and declared she did not want to "live in a bedridden state, stripped of dignity and independence".

Taylor wanted to have assistance to die when she felt her life was no longer worth living, and assurance that those who helped her to end her life would not be prosecuted. She believed this was her right under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Posthumously – she died of an infection in 2012 – she emphatically won that right in February this year, when the Supreme Court of Canada delivered a sweeping decision that declared aid in dying was a constitutional right for Canadians suffering serious and incurable diseases.

The unanimous decision of nine senior Canadian judges is now set to resonate through New Zealand's law books, with 41-year-old brain cancer sufferer Lecretia Seales seeking a declaratory judgment from the High Court that would ensure her GP would not face criminal charges if she helped her to die.

A few weeks ago, Seales' bid for court intervention would have seemed like a legal long shot. But the Canadian decision has produced an extraordinarily broad and robust legal canvas on which her lawyers will draw the argument that the legal prohibitions on assisting suicide or hastening death at a patient's request are a breach of her human rights.

Among the key elements of the Canadian ruling, the court concluded that the prohibition on assisted dying:

- forces some people to take their own lives prematurely out of fear that their disease will render them incapable of doing so, therefore depriving them of their right to life. The law presented people with a "cruel choice" between committing suicide while still able, and putting up with intolerable suffering.

- infringes the liberty of people suffering from a "grievous and irremediable" illness by depriving them of the ability to make decisions concerning their "bodily integrity".
- impinges on their security by leaving them to endure "intolerable suffering".

Evolving law

The Canadian Supreme Court ruling on assisted dying is the most far-reaching judicial decision on the issue, but the law is developing rapidly in other jurisdictions too. US lawyer Kathryn Tucker, who has spent more than two decades advocating for people seeking the right to die, outlined the most significant developments during a recent lecture tour of New Zealand.

In New Mexico, the court ruled under the state's constitution that "there is no right more fundamental, more private or more integral to the liberty, safety and happiness of a New Mexican than the right of a competent, terminally ill patient to choose aid in dying".

In evidence, the New Mexico Psychological Association said there was a "clear difference between suicide and the choice of a competent, terminally ill patient for a peaceful death".

The ruling has been appealed.

The Montana Supreme Court ruled in 2009 that aid in dying was lawful under the state constitution, which guarantees citizens the right to dignity and privacy.

In Oregon, 1327 people have chosen assisted dying since it was legalised in 1997. The data shows most are highly educated and affluent, and 93% were enrolled in hospice care.

The sanctity of life is a fundamental value, but it doesn't require that all human life must be preserved at all costs, the court said in Carter v Canada (named for one of Taylor's co-plaintiffs, Lee Carter, who helped her dying mother travel to Switzerland to die at a Dignitas clinic). "It is for this reason that the law has come to recognise that, in certain circumstances, an individual's choice about the end of her life is entitled to respect."

In a rare move to underline the unanimity and strength of the decision, the ruling was issued in the name of "The Court", rather than in the names of individual judges.

The decision upheld the findings of the original trial judge in the Supreme Court of British Columbia, who ruled on the basis of "copious evidence" that permitting assisted dying did not lead to the oft-cited "slippery slope" of abuse in which vulnerable, frail and disabled people would be pressured to die. Evidence from permissive regimes such as those in Oregon and the Netherlands showed that it was possible to design a system that protects vulnerable people. Nor did legalised assisted dying impede their wedding day.

the development of palliative care. In some places that allowed assisted dying, palliative care improved. The evidence also showed doctors could detect if a patient was being coerced to die against their will.

The ruling concluded that people who meet certain criteria should be able to have physician assistance to die. They need to be “competent” adults, clearly consent to the hastening of death, and have a grievous and irremediable medical condition (a disease, illness or disability) that causes “intolerable” suffering.

SOLID LEGAL GROUNDS

The Canadian ruling will be front and centre of the legal arguments Seales’ lawyers make on her behalf in the High Court. New Zealand’s Bill of Rights Act guarantees the right to life, and the right not to be subjected to “cruel, degrading, or disproportionately severe treatment”. The facts of Seales’ condition are that she has an inoperable and advancing brain tumour that is progressively depriving her of the use of one side of her body. She and her husband have been told she may have only months to live. Confronted with the prospect of “great suffering”, she argues that she alone ought to have the right to determine when she has “reached the end of the road”.

The Crimes Act makes it unlawful for anyone to aid and abet suicide, punishable by 14 years in jail. A doctor who deliberately hastens the death of a patient – even if the person has made repeated and cogent requests to die and is suffering greatly – faces the risk of prosecution for culpable homicide.

Seales’ lawyers will argue that her illness, the prospect of intolerable suffering and her mental competence to make the decision entitle her under the Bill of Rights Act to seek help (either by being given a prescription of medication to enable her to commit suicide or by lethal injection by her doctor).

If the court accepts that Seales meets the criteria laid out in the Canadian decision and that decision is applicable in the New Zealand courts, her lawyers will argue it must therefore conclude that the Crimes Act can’t be invoked in her case because any act by her doctor to hasten death would not be unlawful. The Bill of Rights Act states that wherever a law can be given a meaning that is "consistent with the rights and freedoms" in the Act, "that meaning shall be preferred".

Seales argues that she alone should have the right to determine when she has "reached the end of the road".

If Seales dies before the case is finalised, it would be up to the court to decide whether to continue hearing the evidence and issue a ruling.

Constitutional law expert Andrew Geddis believes Seales' legal team have "extremely solid legal grounds" on which to argue her case. "It's not just built on emotion, it's an actual legal issue to be resolved." But a great deal hinges on how the court receives the plea for a ruling, and how the Crown, as respondent, argues its case.

Geddis says Seales – a respected lawyer who is a senior policy adviser with the Law Commission – is asking the courts to go to "the edge of what they feel comfortable doing, because you are asking them in essence to decide the law on what is a really contested social question".

It won't be lost on the court that New Zealand parliamentarians have repeatedly blocked attempts to change the law.

Two private member's bills that would have legalised assisted dying have been defeated at first reading in the past two decades, and late last year Labour leader Andrew Little told his MP Iain Lees-Galloway to remove the End of Life Choice Bill from the ballot. The bill was initially presented by former MP Maryan Street in 2012.

Geddis says the court may try to avoid ruling on Seales' case; under the Declaratory Judgments Act 1908, it is at the discretion of the court to say, "I don't have enough facts" or "It wouldn't be appropriate". He says the Crown's first line of argument may be to say that the court should decline to rule, or alternatively that the Canadian decision doesn't apply in New Zealand and that this country's complete ban on assisted dying is justified under the Bill of Rights Act.

Attorney-General Chris Finlayson declined a request from the Listener to discuss the Crown's response to Seales' case.

SELECT COMMITTEE INQUIRY

When Seales decided late last year to tell her story to the Listener, her aim was to lend support to the End of Life Choice Bill, which was then still in the ballot. With the bill subsequently sidelined, her only option for pursuing reform has been to seek court intervention. And although her lawyers stress that any favourable ruling the court delivers would apply only to her and would not be precedent-setting, it would almost certainly encourage others in a similar situation to seek a court ruling.

Geddis says having the courts deciding on individual cases would quickly become "messy" and would force Parliament to act on the issue.

Street, who remains a vocal advocate for reform, describes Seales' bid for a court ruling as "elegant". "The courts can't tell Parliament what to do, but if the courts do arrive at the conclusion she is seeking ... it would be a brave 121 MPs who then decide to ignore it."

The legal action also gives impetus to a planned bid by Lees-Galloway to have the issue put back on the political agenda. He told the Listener this week that Little has backed him to push for a select committee inquiry into assisted dying. This would follow the approach taken in Quebec in 2012, when a bipartisan select committee undertook a wide-ranging inquiry that resulted in a report backing assisted dying as part of end of life care. The law has been changed in Quebec as a result.

Lees-Galloway says this approach would enable New Zealanders to participate in a proper debate, supported by the resources of Parliament. The select committee would not need a bill to prompt such an inquiry. He says the best way to trigger it would be when a petition being circulated by the Voluntary Euthanasia Society is tabled. The petition asks Parliament to investigate public attitudes towards "medically assisted dying in the event of a terminal illness or an irreversible condition which makes life unbearable".

One way or another, says Geddis, "Parliament needs to do its job, and it's shocking that it hasn't." ■

by Nicky Pellegrino

The fab five

Hard-to-cure irritable bowel syndrome can affect overall health, but the five-step plan may ease the symptoms.

Benjamin Brown was on a trip through Europe when he picked up a case of traveller's diarrhoea. Determined to continue with his journey, he pushed on, only to end up collapsing in Paris and being hospitalised for several days. Once home, he continued to experience nausea, cramping and pain.

"Although I'd practised natural medicine for years, I was so unwell I didn't know what was wrong," says Brown, a UK-based naturopath. A barrage of tests ruled out serious illness. His heart, liver, kidneys and blood were given the all-clear and he was confirmed to be free of internal parasites.

"Once I knew it wasn't anything life-threatening, I decided it was time to dig deeper," says Brown. "So I had a comprehensive gut bacteria assessment. My results were the worst I'd ever seen." In fact, when he shared his test results with a scientist over dinner, the expert promptly moved his chair back a few paces.

Brown had a case of post-infectious irritable bowel syndrome (IBS). Although successive courses of probiotics improved the balance of bacteria in his gut, by then he had started to react to certain foods. So he developed the treatment plan now detailed in his book The Digestive Health Solution (Exisle, $34.99).

Historically, irritable bowel syndrome is one of those conditions that tended to be dismissed as all in the mind. Even today it remains a source of confusion. "It's poorly managed and misdiagnosed," says Brown. "Up to one in four people suffer with digestive symptoms and many have no idea why."

Part of the reason for it being such an enigma is there is no single cause of the syndrome, symptoms can vary and there isn't one test that will reliably diagnose it. Plus there is no easy cure-all drug to be prescribed.

Kiwifruit is one of the foods identified as a digestive health superstar.

"A friend who works in an ER told me that when people come in with symptoms, they rule out colon cancer and inflammatory bowel disease; then if they have IBS, they send them home because there's nothing they can do," says Brown.

Many sufferers start relying on antacids to get them through periods of digestive issues, but over time this can worsen the condition. "Antacids are one of the most commonly used over-the-counter medications and the main problem with them is that stomach acid is there for a reason," says Brown.

"If you block it, which is what antacids do, you'll get small intestine bacterial overgrowth very quickly. That stops you digesting properly, meaning you can develop food sensitivities, skin disorders and respiratory problems."

Irritable bowel syndrome's classic symptoms are abdominal pain, bloating and erratic bowel movements, but these can extend to a host of other related complaints such as muscle pain, headaches, fatigue and anxiety. "The severity varies a lot," says Brown. "Some people will only have symptoms a few times a month; others can't go to work."

A bigger issue is that digestive function determines many aspects of overall health. "When I went to college, we all knew digestive health was important," says Brown, "but in the past five years in the scientific community it's exploded – this idea that it's linked to everything in your body. From obesity and diabetes to heart disease, dementia and depression, your digestion really is paramount to your overall health."

Many foods thought of as healthy can actually aggravate IBS and early advice to up the amount of fibre in the diet was also counterproductive. Brown's solution is a five-step plan that starts with relieving symptoms using natural treatments such as peppermint oil capsules, digestive enzyme supplements, artichoke leaf extract and aloe vera juice. He stresses that these solutions can take weeks to be fully effective.

Step two is to cultivate good gut bacteria using probiotics – live bacteria consumed as a supplement or in fermented foods such as yogurt. Brown suggests taking a probiotic for a minimum of four weeks, and if that doesn't improve things, trying a different product to see if that's more effective. Prebiotic supplements that nourish good gut bacteria can also help.

Since the central nervous system directly affects the gut, Brown's third step involves relaxation techniques such as abdominal breathing and meditation. Step four means eliminating potential problem foods such as gluten, dairy products, starchy carbohydrates and bad fats from the diet. And the final step is staying symptom-free with good eating, exercise and sleep habits.

Kiwifruit is one of the foods Brown identifies as being a digestive health superstar as it is high in digestive enzymes, prebiotics and gentle fibre.

"The trouble is there's no one answer," he points out. "There are several answers that vary from person to person."

Having identified his own gut as a personal weak spot, Brown continues to use probiotics as a preventative measure. "I've taken them every day since I got sick. And although I don't like being reliant, if it works and it's safe, it's worth it." ■

FOLIC STROKE FINDING

Strokes are the second leading cause of death worldwide and new research from China has shown folic acid may play a role in preventing them. The study included more than 20,000 adults with high blood pressure. Those who supplemented their medication with folic acid had a significantly reduced risk of having a first stroke. In China there is no folic acid fortification of foods, but researchers at Peking University First Hospital believe that even in countries where it's common, there may still be room to reduce stroke incidence with targeted folic acid therapy.

ENERGY DRINK WORRY

Concerns have been raised over the health safety of energy drinks following findings by researchers at the Mayo Clinic that consumption causes a marked rise in blood pressure, particularly in people who don't ordinarily consume much caffeine. In the study, healthy adults aged 19-40 were given a commercially available energy drink or a placebo. The results have led to concerns that using these drinks could increase the risk of cardiovascular problems, even in the young.

MOZART BOOSTS BRAIN

Listening to classical music enhances the activity of genes responsible for secreting "feel-good" hormone dopamine as well as genes involved in learning and memory. A Finnish study had participants listen to Mozart's Violin Concerto No 3 for 20 minutes and found it affected the gene profiles of both the musically experienced and inexperienced. Listening to the concerto also down-regulated genes associated with brain degeneration.

NUTRITION

Raw facts

Vegetables that are uncooked are often better for us, but not always.

It's my mother's fault that for years I refused to eat cooked vegetables. She was a skilled exponent of the boiled-to-buggery method of cooking and I just couldn't stomach the piles of soggy, tasteless, often unrecognisable greens she would plonk on my plate.

So I insisted on eating most of my veges raw, and happily crunched away on uncooked cabbage, beans, spinach, broccoli and cauliflower, ignoring those who thought I had weird eating habits. When the raw food movement came along, suddenly I was a trendsetter rather than a picky eater.

Foods that haven't been subjected to heat are much better for us because cooking destroys many nutrients – or so raw-food advocates say. And in some cases that's correct, especially if the vegetables in question are cooked at very high temperatures, contain water-soluble vitamins, have been fried for a long time or are barbecued until burnt.

But there are occasions when the opposite is true. Some vegetables are healthier for us when cooked because the process makes them easier to digest and frees up nutrients for our bodies to absorb.

Tomatoes are a good example. They're a great source of lycopene, a compound linked to a lower risk of heart attacks and some cancers.

Tests carried out at Cornell University in the US found there was up to 35% more lycopene in cooked tomatoes than in raw ones.

That's because heat breaks down the fruit's cell walls, making it easier for our bodies to absorb the nutrients.

Likewise, carrots are better cooked than crunchy because being exposed to heat increases the availability of beta-carotene, the antioxidant that is converted to vitamin A and improves bone, eye and reproductive health.

When mushrooms are sautéed, baked, boiled,

In the case of some veges, there are both pros and cons to eating them raw. For example, when broccoli is cooked, the heat damages an enzyme called myrosinase, which has the important job of creating sulforaphane.

Sulforaphane is an A-lister among healthy compounds. Some studies show it may be able to stop cancerous cells from multiplying and may even kill them off. That means it's a good idea to eat broccoli and other cruciferous vegetables such as cauliflower, cabbage and Brussels sprouts raw, as they have about a third more sulforaphane than their cooked equivalents.

However, you need to cook cruciferous vegetables for them to release indole, a highly valuable organic compound that can help kill precancerous cells before they become malignant, so there's a case to be made for eating them both ways.

You need to cook cruciferous vegetables for them to release a compound that can help kill precancerous cells.

grilled or roasted, they release potassium. And you'll absorb more calcium, iron and magnesium from spinach when it's cooked.

Asparagus should also be served cooked to make the most of ferulic acid, an antioxidant that is particularly good for skin health.

On the other side of the coin, vegetables that may pack a bigger punch when they're raw include those that are high in vitamin C, such as red peppers. That's because vitamin C breaks down during cooking. Garlic and onions are also best served au naturel – or very lightly cooked if you can't bear the taste of them raw – because that way you get more allicin, a phytonutrient they contain.

Steaming veges is better than boiling them because it avoids overcooking. Asparagus and spinach are best served "wilted" rather than boiled.

The bottom line when it comes to getting the best out of veges is to mix them up: eat them raw in salads and as snacks, and cook them as accompaniments to meals or in dishes such as casseroles and stews. That way you're covering all your bases.

The most important thing is that they do get eaten, because they're key to meeting many of our nutrition needs. ■

Philanthropist Dame Rosie Horton has helped raise millions of dollars over the past 40 years for a range of organisations, many of them focused on sick women and children. However, she readily admits she hasn't had as much success in the kitchen and virtually all she is capable of cooking is poached eggs.

Is healthy eating a priority for you? Absolutely – if I don't eat regular, nutritious meals, I get migraines, and have since I was a child. I was brought up on healthy food. Back then, everyone had orchards, gardens and hens and the food was truly fresh. Do you follow any special diet and why? I eat a fat-free diet as my body can't seem to tolerate fat, and unfortunately I'm not very good with cheese. It's in the genes as other family members have the same problem.

Has anything else forced you to eat differently?

Three years ago, I ate more fish and chicken. But I became anaemic and now need to eat red meat regularly. Eating lamb's fry twice a week works a dream – my blood count's changed dramatically.

Who enjoys cooking more – you or your husband?

Me, cooking? I don't think so. My husband, Michael, is a great cook, though. Mind you, if he sees me with a cookbook, he gets excited that there may be a breakthrough, but there hasn't been so far.

A favourite childhood food memory is ... of great roast dinners with siblings, relatives and visitors. Growing up in Ashburton, it was 101 ways with a leg of lamb. We also ate lots of steamed, sponge and rice puddings.

New Zealand's biggest food-related issue is ... child obesity. It concerns me that many young children risk getting diabetes and are facing a lifetime of problems. The Garden to Table programme in schools is fantastic because children learn about food at the source: the pleasure of growing, cooking and eating their own harvest. Hats off to its founder Catherine Bell.

I usually snack on ... water crackers topped with tomato or avocado. I also have cravings for Gingernuts.

Describe a memorable meal. I was cruising on a river in Germany, saw a cafe called Rosie's and thought, "What fun!" Wrong – it was gross. All they had was white sausages and stewed potatoes. There were no greens because it was the time of the Chernobyl disaster. I managed to eat the lot and everyone in the restaurant clapped. Lesson: never eat at a place called Rosie's – anywhere.

Spook busters

You don't need to be paranoid to want to keep your online activities secret – but it helps.

This column is for the paranoid, the vaguely suspicious or anyone who just wants to keep safe on the internet. It's for the 43% of people who indicated in a New Zealand Herald online poll they were "incensed" about the latest spying revelations from Edward Snowden.

Documents stolen from the US National Security Agency showed that our external spy agency, the Government Communications Security Bureau (GCSB), had been scooping up our Pacific neighbours' digital chatter for years and passing the contents on to its Five Eyes buddies.

Interestingly, 51% of the nearly 15,000 poll respondents ticked the "I'm fine with that" box. A lot of us just don't get that worked up about online security.

I'm not particularly worried about the prospect of GCSB or the NSA looking through my email. But the sort of untargeted, dragnet surveillance NSA whistle-blower Snowden has spectacularly shown the Fives Eyes security agencies to be involved in potentially changes everything.

We don't have a government that throws dissidents in jail based on the contents of their instant message conversations. Not yet, anyway. Who knows what the future holds?

It will probably hold, for the administrations that inherit it, a treasure trove of data that can be sifted and sorted for years to come to reveal our political persuasions, finances, health status, loves and fears – anything and everything we digitise and send across a network.

It isn't just governments seeking to Hoover up our data. Hackers have taken advantage of major data breaches to help themselves to the credit card details, user names and passwords of millions of people. Because of this, the tech buzzword of the day is "encryption".

Many of our internet transactions are already encrypted, meaning they're indecipherable if intercepted; only those equipped with a unique cryptographic key can unlock the contents. Prime hacking targets such as banks, online retailers and email providers use data encryption to protect their customers' identities and cash.

Look in the address line of your browser: if the address is preceded by the letters https, it means the website is offering encryption. But not all websites can be trusted to do so, and security flaws crop up with worrying regularity in some of the key security protocols we rely on.

THREE TOOLS FOR ENCRYPTING YOURSELF

HTTPS EVERYWHERE

A plug-in for the Chrome, Firefox and Opera web browsers that cleverly applies https encryption to sites that don't normally offer it. Fairly easy to use, but it won't work with some sites, which will need to be manually excluded.

ADIUM

A free "off the record" web chat client for Apple Macs that logs you into instant-messaging platforms such as Facebook Messenger and Google Talk, encrypting your conversations with other Adium users.

GPG4WIN

A powerful tool for encrypting files and email stored on and sent to and from Windows computers.

Check out the Electronic Frontier Foundation's guide to defending yourself from snooping: ssd.eff.org

Although many big sites encrypt data transactions, the likes of Google and Facebook can still read your messages on their networks. Snowden's initial leaks revealed the NSA is tapping into webmail services and social networks to get the "full fire hose" of data anyway.

In reality nothing is safe, unless you use an "end-to-end" encryption service to add an extra layer of security. But my experience with a range of encryption tools is that most are too complicated.

Indeed, the journalist who broke the Snowden story, Glenn Greenwald, nearly missed the scoop because he didn't know how to install the encryption software Snowden favoured for keeping chats private.

Email providers such as Yahoo! and Google are looking to introduce end-to-end encryption for email to try to regain our confidence in the wake of the Snowden revelations. That will require users to install a browser plug-in. There's talk of cross-compatibility between the big email platforms, which would be a promising development. ■

Copy that

They say imitation's the sincerest form of flattery – or is there an ulterior motive?

William George Sinclair, better known by his stage name Willy Moon, is a New Zealand-born musician, songwriter and producer. He was the first singer ever to wear a suit." Or so read disgraced X Factor judge Moon's Wikipedia entry for a brief moment, until pro-Moon editors got their hands on it.

What a kerfuffle! BuzzFeed subsequently outed more than 20 celebrities, some of whom were probably dead before Moon was born, who had clearly copied his besuited look. Elvis and Abraham Lincoln, for example. The humorously captioned photos show Rat Packer Peter Lawford remarking, "It's disgusting", while Frank Sinatra says, "You have no identity."

Clearly Moon did not pioneer the suit (though I admit he certainly looks good in one in a way a podgy middle-aged academic doesn't). But copying is a sincere form of flattery anyway, isn't it?

It better be, as it's standard advice that to build rapport one should "match and mirror" the actions of those we interact with. Studies show that we tend to like people we think are like us, and although that can mean likes and dislikes, attitudes and whatnot, it also includes behaviour and language. Communication accommodation theory outlines how when we talk to people we often adjust the way we speak to bring our vocal and verbal style closer to theirs. Some of us are high accommodators in that we quickly and unintentionally find ourselves mimicking others' styles. This can be quite embarrassing – put me in a room with someone with a strong Glaswegian accent and there's a risk that within five minutes they'll think I'm taking the mickey.

Put me in a room with someone with a strong accent and there's a risk they'll think I'm taking the mickey.

We "converge" in this way because it oils the wheels of social interaction, but we're also more likely to do it if we're attracted to the other person, or if we're trying to be persuasive or get something out of the conversation.

But we don't always accommodate. In some situations we might avoid doing so to maintain differences in social status. We may even "diverge" in order to enhance the social gap between us and someone else, or to help us feel special.

We can over-accommodate too, with potential consequences beyond my Glaswegian friend thinking I deserve a kicking. Beware trying too hard to mirror your conversation partner. You'll look like a Willy – I mean wally – and it'll undermine the rapport you're trying to build.

Other examples of accommodation include the way people often talk to elderly people or patients in ways that echo baby talk. In this case, the baby talker is overgeneralising and talking to one group of dependent people (the elderly) in the same way they talk to another (children). It's patronising and disempowering, but also rarely deliberate and usually well intentioned.

Rest homes are one setting for accommodational errors, and there are others in which our approach to language differs. Doctors have a particular way of talking, as do the players in the court room. Judges may accommodate less to emphasise who's in charge, whereas cross-examiners may strongly accommodate to get a witness to trust them.

Unrelated to accommodation but illustrated in the court room is a particular feature of what's considered a "powerless" speech style – rising intonation at the end of a statement. We expect this when we're asked a question, but when we hear it at the end of a statement, it makes the speaker sound uncertain and as if they're seeking affirmation. Of course, it's not limited to court rooms – it occurs in many situations in which there's a marked difference in status.

I don't wear a suit very often. But when I do, I'm sure I'm not alone in doing so not to emulate Willy Moon, but because I'm accommodating to the situation. ■

MONEY

Turning tables

Fewer women are taking their place in New Zealand boardrooms despite earnest attempts at greater gender balance.

Business consultancy Grant Thornton's latest report on women in business leadership suggests more than 100 years of progress since winning the right to vote may be reversing. Less than a fifth of senior management positions in New Zealand are held by women, below the long-run average of 28%.

Sharemarket operator NZX requires listed companies to report their gender diversity at an executive and board level. In 2014, the proportion of female directors inched up to 14% from 12% in 2013, while the proportion of women in executive jobs climbed to 21% from 19%.

The Human Rights Commission, in its 2012 biennial census of women's workforce participation, found New Zealand was making "slow, incremental but unspectacular progress for women in many areas". In terms of corporate governance, if progress continues at the pace of the past decade, it will be 35 years before boardroom parity is reached.

Measurement of progress has taken a knock too. The commission has quietly binned the census, due last year, saying it was "too research-intensive" to continue as it reprioritised its limited resources. Professor Judy McGregor, who oversaw the census in her former role as equal employment opportunity commissioner, has vowed to resuscitate the report as head of social sciences and public policy at Auckland University of Technology.

"It's vital that the census report is published every two years because it provides objective statistical data about the actual status and representation of women in governance, management, the public service, law, accountancy, science, the armed forces, the police, sport, politics and the judiciary as well as in New Zealand universities," she says. "This data is necessary to counter anecdotal views about women's progress and aspirational rhetoric that may not have a basis in fact."

"Boards are conscious of the demand for more even representation. But it is a matter of finding the right people."

Women made up 47% of the workforce in the fourth quarter, based on the Household Labour Force Survey. That's up from 42% in 1986, when the series began, and provides some evidence of evolution in the role of women. Their potential to rise to the top, to join the decision-makers, may be more constrained even as acceptance grows that diversity can yield higher-quality decisions.

"I'm firmly of the view that diversity is extremely important on boards, and I've seen enough now to see the difference that makes," says Dame Patsy Reddy, chair of the New Zealand Film Commission and a 30-year veteran of boardrooms.

"What I am most shocked about, having not looked at it a lot until the past couple of years, is how little it really has changed," she said.

Dame Alison Paterson is a boardroom pioneer: she was the first woman appointed to a New Zealand listed company, the first to sit on a producer board and the first to preside over a New Zealand chamber of commerce branch.

The value of diversity, whether by gender, ethnicity or background, is the different perspectives that are brought to the boardroom, says Paterson, who is on lines company Vector's board and was deputy chair of the Reserve Bank. But skills and experience need to come first, she says.

"All boards are very conscious of the demand for more even representation, so they are thinking about it," she says. "But it is a matter of finding the right people."

Paterson says change has been "incremental" but points out that women have been in the workforce only for the better part of a century and it takes time to build director-level experience.

A 2012 industry-driven initiative, the 25% Group, set itself the target of lifting women's board representation to 25% this year. That will be a stretch.

The group was convened by Andrew Barclay, chief executive of Goldman Sachs New Zealand, and includes Joan Withers, who chairs Television New Zealand and Mighty River Power. Both say investors are increasingly looking at diversity in terms of corporate risk management – a way to avoid board "group think".

Barclay says there's a trend among new listed companies to tout board diversity as an asset, though overall results are mixed. A survey by the group in 2012 found women made up 11% of board members of companies worth more than $500 million, but a large tail of companies were without women directors. The former figure has since grown to 20% but boards without female directors remain.

With progress seemingly stagnating, some, including McGregor, have called for New Zealand to follow countries such as Germany, Norway, Italy and the Netherlands in introducing a mandatory female director quota. But Withers says that would send the wrong signal.

"I adamantly oppose quotas because they demean whoever gets the gig. If you're sitting at the board table because you have to make up a number to reach some target, that is enormously, or potentially enormously, disempowering."

Paterson is also unconvinced a quota system would achieve the right outcome. "I don't know that coercion is ever a very good idea. I think also it runs the risk of watering down the quality of appointments," she says.

There are alternative strategies. As chair of the Film Commission, Reddy says there is a worryingly low number of women film-makers, but rather than enforce quotas for grants at the highest level and expect more female directors to materialise, the commission is tackling the issue at grass-roots level, encouraging more women to take up internships.

Although there is no silver bullet to issues of representation, Withers agrees mentorships and urging women to put themselves forward are part of the way to boost female membership on boards.

One of the most important moves by the 25% Group was to kill off the old boys' club argument that good women couldn't be found, Barclay says. The group targeted recruitment consultants, which are increasingly used to fill board seats, who can bring in talent from a wider pool.

"When the existing boards did a DIY job, it was a case of 'I know somebody who I can tap on the shoulder and he looks just like me' sort of thing," says Barclay. "That was the No 1 reason we did the work around recruitment consultants – to take off the table the idea that women weren't available. If you look, there is no inventory problem; it is an identification problem." ■

FOOD

Fare share

Arrange your dishes in the middle and invite everyone to tuck in.

There's been a marked shift in the way restaurateurs want us to eat when we dine out. The traditional idea of an entrée followed by a main course and then dessert seems to be fast disappearing. These days we're handed menus that offer bites, tastes, small plates, shared plates, things to nibble, sides, larger plates, sweet things ... We're encouraged to order a selection of dishes that are then arranged on the table for everyone to dig into.

We're also doing away with individual servings at home, too. Like most of my friends, I deliver food to the table in big bowls so guests can help themselves. That way each person decides how much to eat, and it's also kind to people with special dietary needs as they can avoid anything that they can't or won't tolerate.

This Easter, I'll be cooking my usual celebratory lamb and keeping the meal simple. My favourite cut is a rack of cutlets, which I roast, then slice into chops. It suits everyone at my table, including the wee ones, who love to chew on the little bones.

CHOOSING THE BEST ingredients is the key to creating delicious dishes. For this recipe, seek out lamb racks with a cap of fat, rather than lean meat. It's the fat that provides that burst of flavour in the meat and prevents it drying out.

LAMB RACK WITH THYME AND MUSTARD CRUST

2 small racks of lamb (about nine cutlets on each)

2 tbsp Dijon mustard

1 tbsp extra virgin olive oil

2 tbsp chopped thyme

1 tsp salt

1 tsp freshly ground black pepper

Lamb rack with thyme and mustard crust and crunchy crushed potatoes. Below, carrots with honey and olive oil.

Preheat the oven to 190°C. Scrape any meat off the lengths of the lamb bones. Mix the mustard, oil, thyme, salt and pepper in a bowl to form a paste. Spread over the fatty cap of the lamb.

Place the lamb in a small roasting pan in which it fits snugly. Roast for 15 minutes, then remove and wrap the racks in foil, placing a tea towel over the parcel to keep the meat hot while it rests for at least 10 minutes.

Carve between the bones to create neat cutlets. Serve with the following potatoes and carrots and a fresh green salad, with a fruity chutney on the side.

 Serves 6.

 Wine match: pinot noir or chardonnay.

CHOOSE FIRM ROASTING potatoes for this recipe. The best variety is agria, as the yellow flesh fluffs up and provides a lovely contrast to the crisp, crunchy exterior. The secret to creating a really fluffy interior is to boil the potatoes first until they're almost starting to break down.

CRUNCHY CRUSHED POTATOES

1kg small roasting potatoes (agria)

4 tbsp olive oil

2 tbsp butter

1 tsp salt

1 tsp freshly ground black pepper

Preheat the oven to 190°C. Peel the potatoes and cut any larger ones into halves or quarters. Cover with water and bring to a steady boil, then simmer for about 15 minutes. Drain, then place in a colander to allow them to dry out so any dampness is removed before roasting.

Heat the oil and butter in a roasting pan in the oven. Gently crush the potatoes with a fork. Don't worry if they crumble a little as any smaller bits will crisp up beautifully. Toss into the roasting pan and turn gently in the heated oil mixture, adding the salt and pepper.

Roast the potatoes for about 40 minutes, turning once or twice so they become evenly golden and crisp.

Serves 6.

CARROTS WITH HONEY AND OLIVE OIL

600g carrots

$\frac{1}{2}$ tsp salt

2 tbsp olive oil

1 tbsp honey

7-8 sprigs fresh thyme

Freshly ground black pepper

Quality, baa none

How do you find the nation's best meat? It's hard work, but someone's gotta do it! Eating my way through 20 chunks of the country's most tender and tasty lamb was a revelation recently when I was invited to help judge the finals of the Glammies, held annually as part of the Upper Clutha A&P show in Wanaka.

Farmers enter their best lamb, raised in their best paddocks. The first round of more than 150 entries is whittled down by scientific analysis and testing by Cambridge meat-processing specialist Carne Technologies. Next, a panel of judges tastes the top 20 entries in front of an audience of farmers and show visitors.

There was no doubt in my mind when I tasted the winning entry, a Highlander-Primera-Textel cross lamb produced by Hamish Buchanan on his Dannevirke farm. The pale pink meat had a fine grain, was sweetly scented and seemed to melt in my mouth. Buchanan told me the lamb had been fed a diet of the lush clover/plantain/chicory grass he grows on his property.

What was even more impressive about my Glammies experience was there wasn't a single sample that I didn't enjoy. New Zealand lamb should be considered a national treasure.

Peel the carrots and cut into neat batons 10-12cm long and 2-3cm wide. Place in a saucepan, cover with water and add the salt. Bring to the boil and allow to simmer for 10 minutes until tender but still a little firm.

Drain, then add the oil, honey and thyme. Toss over heat and allow to barely simmer for about 2 minutes, until the carrots are completely coated.

Serve hot with black pepper ground over the top.

Lauded labels

Sniff out wines from some of the world's most appealing brands.

If you stumbled across this ranking of the top five of the world's countless brands of wine – (1) Torres, (2) Vega Sicilia, (3) Penfolds, (4) Villa Maria, (5) Château D'Yquem – on what basis would you think they were selected?

Drinks International, in the UK, claims they're the most admired brands of all. Over 200 wine professionals anonymously took part in a poll in which the judging criteria included "consistent or improving quality", reflecting a "region or country of origin" and "strong appeal to a wide demographic".

The top 50 labels are an odd mix of supermarket brands (Jacob's Creek, Mateus, Lindeman's) and prestigious labels (Louis Latour, Lafite, Château Mouton-Rothschild). EuroVintage, a major wine importer, distributes several of the most-admired brands here, including Torres, Casillero del Diablo (6), Chapoutier (11), Trapiche (37) and McGuigan (43).

Chapoutier Belleruche Côtes-du-Rhône 2013 ★★★★★

The "roasted nuts" character typical of Rhône Valley reds is clearly on display here. Showing good density, it's sturdy and savoury with ripe, plummy, spicy, slightly nutty flavours. Drink now or cellar. $23

Chapoutier Pays d'Oc 2014 ★★★★★

Ever wondered what French rosé tastes like? Pale pink, this mouth-filling, fully dry wine has lively strawberry and spice flavours with a hint of apricot and excellent freshness and drinkability. $16

Torres Gran Coronas 2011 ★★★★★

Quietly classy, this Spanish cabernet

sauvignon is dark and full-bodied with blackcurrant-like flavours, deliciously rich, ripe and rounded. $23

Torres Coronas Tempranillo 2012

This Spanish red offers great value. Invitingly perfumed, it has concentrated flavours of dark berries, plums and spices, a subtle seasoning of oak and greater depth and complexity than you'd expect for $18.

Concha y Toro Casillero del Diablo Reserva Cabernet Sauvignon 2013

Deeply coloured and mouthfilling with fresh, strong, blackcurrant and herb flavours to the fore, this Chilean red is drinking well now and bargain-priced. $14

McGuigan Reserve South Australia Shiraz 2013 ★★★★★

Vibrantly fruity, this is an uncomplicated style with fresh plum, berry and spice flavours and hints of liquorice and nuts. Generous, ripe-tasting and smooth, it's ready to roll. $13 ■

WINE OF THE WEEK

Trapiche Oak Cask Malbec 2013

Malbec is Argentina's star red. Dark and sturdy with a powerful surge of fresh blackcurrant, plum and spice flavours and a seductively smooth finish, this delicious wine is a steal at $14.

Duel purpose

The oldest sledge in the book stirs up a right spectacle.

Former Australian fast bowler Geoff Lawson reckoned it was the first time in the Cricket World Cup that “passion rather than professionalism was ruling the day”. (It wasn’t the last: there was passion aplenty at Eden Park as the Black Caps clawed their way into our first-ever final.)

The media consensus was that it will be talked about for years. A Sri Lankan writer went full Homer: “Few will forget the theatre and the unbri-dled oscillating emotion of this spell. Tattooed into their nerves will be the night a fast bowler filled a stadium with his fury; the half hour their collective pulses raced in sync with a batsman’s heart.”

A tournament organiser’s dream, you’d think. One of those magic moments when sport trans-cends its essentially ephemeral nature and the competitors’ strivings acquire an epic quality. Yet Pakistani fast bowler Wahab Riaz and Aussie bats-man Shane Watson’s reward for staging this spectacle was to be fined 50% and 15% of their match fees respectively. No doubt they were also warned about their future conduct. We should never be surprised when sports administrators slip on their own banana skins, but this was ludicrous.

Following Phillip Hughes’s death and the subsequent hand-wringing over player behaviour, the International Cricket Council resolved to toughen “behav-ioural obligations” at the World Cup. People who enjoy making regula-tions generally aren’t of a mind to accept that there are exceptions to every rule. Thus, because a few words were exchanged in the heat of the moment, a dramatic cricketing duel was treated as gratuitous spitefulness and deemed unacceptable.

Reinforcing the ludicrousness was the fact that it involved byplay that wouldn’t be regarded as untoward in club cricket. When he was batting, Riaz played and missed at four deliver-ies in a Mitchell Starc over, prompting the bowler to remind him that, “It’s the white thing – you have to hit it.”

This is a variation on the oldest sledge in the book: a batsman is having trouble laying bat on ball; the bowler tells him, “It’s round, it’s red/white and it’s got a seam.” (In apocryphal retellings, the batsman invariably smokes the next delivery out of the park and tells the bowler, “You know what it looks like – you find the f---er”.)

The Aussies stirred Wahab into a righteous fury and Watson reaped the whirlwind: he got a real working-over accompanied by regular invasions of his personal space, sarcastic applause and even a blown kiss. If his panicky hook shot had been caught at fine leg – and most schoolboy cricketers would have held it – Australia would have been 83 for four chasing 213. As it was, he rode out the storm and he and Glenn Maxwell – who was also dropped off Riaz – steered Australia to what on paper was victory in a canter but in reality was anything but.

In apocryphal retellings, the batsman smokes the next delivery out of the park and tells the bowler, “You know what it looks like – you find it.”

When it was over, Riaz and Watson shook hands and exchanged warm words, a moment of mutual respect between a bowler who’d given his all and a bats-man who’d been through the fire and come out the other side.

If there was a troubling aspect to this game, it was the two dropped dolly catches that effectively put Australia into the semi-finals.

Everyone drops catches: the West Indies dropped Martin Gup-till on four; he went on to make 237 not out. Perhaps there was no more to it than met the eye, although the fielder who dropped Watson took a far more difficult catch a few minutes earlier.

Sadly but inevitably, eyebrows will be raised when Pakistan loses matches by dropping sitters. You reap what you sow. Just ask Watson. ■

Travellers' checklist

BILL LENNOX knows how your Asian holiday will turn out – before you even set foot on the plane.

When you travel in Southeast Asia, Sri Lanka or India, some things are pretty much inevitable. You'll fall for at least one tour guide – such insight, sensitivity and wit. You'll tip unwisely, bestow precious gifts, resolve to keep in touch – resisting the knowledge that to you they were one out of the box, but to them you were one in a million.

You'll succumb to at least one unwise ethnic clothing purchase, telling yourself you're showing cultural respect. But you'll look like another over-excited wannabe, and even sillier back home.

You'll get bored with haggling. Anyway, it isn't that clever. Remember, when you triumphantly slash 200 rupees off the price of a pashmina or 20,000 dong off a tuk-tuk ride, you've saved yourself about the cost of a cup of coffee and denied a family a meal.

You'll tire – soon, I hope – of sniggering at clumsy translations, typos and mispronunciations. It helps to recall the hash you made of Thiruvananthapuram. Okay, you're allowed to enjoy two. Mine are Nazi goreng and lawful attorney.

Yes, you'll find the driving as scary and chaotic as predicted. But then you'll see its subtle synchronicity, the care shown for everyone else on the road, including you as you teeter across the street. You'll wonder how New Zealand drivers would manage here – and why, if we are so orderly and regulated, driving at home is so fraught.

By perverse logic, you'll find free and reliable Wi-Fi at a tiny Mekong guest house, but pay hefty for it in four-star opulence in KL (or Auckland).

On long drives you'll be tempted to check the guide book. Resist the urge. After all, you've paid a local to show you around. And if a guide suggests a "sight" that isn't mentioned in Lonely Planet, go for it – unless it's another jewellery factory.

You'll be impressed by the fervour of national anniversaries. Liberation, independence and peace are celebrated with flags and parades in every village. There are disturbing history lessons, especially as it was often all about cardamom. Politics back home will seem like a spat in a playcentre.

Unless you drink only cocktails or scotch, you'll be lucky to find your favourite tippie. There will be lager, but it's more fun to drink local red wine. Only you won't find wine on drinks lists, so be patient when waiters look panicked – they're wondering why anyone would drink that stuff while they eat.

In bars, you'll come to love badminton with your beer. Anything played with an oval ball is well down the list – way behind table tennis, boxing, volleyball and kabaddi. And any game played by Lionel Messi or Man United.

When – not if – there's a power outage, you'll suffer an intolerable loss of Wi-Fi but romantically resort to candles. Just when you're losing patience, you'll hear that the supply was cut to conserve power for the stunning illumination of tonight's religious festival. But there will always be food. That's what those battered gas bottles are for.

If you won't eat anything spicy, you'll suffer sad versions of pasta and grilled sandwiches. Foreigners in Hanoi or Kandy complaining "It was nice, but too spicy" are simply ridiculous. Just eat what the locals cook best. If you don't like spicy food, Feast for the senses: remember that those glorious vistas were not created for your benefit, and if you don't like spicy food, stick to the Gold Coast.

go to the Gold Coast again.

You'll look absurd if your camera lens is longer than 5cm. And get that flash under control. Locals placing flowers before a reclining Buddha in a mountain cave ought to be able to do so in the natural gloom – and without having to resist the urge to give you a whack.

It might dawn on you that those glorious vistas were not created for your delight. Terraced tea plantations, shimmering rice paddies, fish markets, vividly painted fishing boats, women fishing waist-deep at low tide and carrying urns of water on their heads – these are all part of an exhausting daily grind.

You'll stop wondering why your driver meekly pays every "village road fee" and buys a raffle ticket "offered" by an army officer. Don't be tempted to single-handedly resist entrenched customs. Feel reassured by politicians who vow to stamp out corruption – eventually.

If you have a health and safety role at work, you're in for repeated shocks. It's not just the absence of ear protection, rails on scaffolding, tidily strung power lines – but also the fact that everything works well enough and serves a population that makes

Auckland feel like a village.

You'll soon learn to run for cover when you see a stallholder refuse a sale and reach for the blue tarpaulin. There's no such thing as a light shower of rain.

If you're a farmer, you're in for a lesson on intensive land use. Palm oil trees crowd airport runways, rice paddies fill gaps between houses, tea plantations spill onto the shoulders of roads. It's not the Mackenzie Country.

By perverse logic, you'll find free and reliable in-room Wi-Fi at a tiny guest house up the Mekong River, but pay hefty for the same service when staying in four-star opulence in Kuala Lumpur (or Auckland).

You could develop an unhealthy obsession with laundry. Its cost underlines the economic gap between you and lowly paid locals. Forty cents for undies is top end. A full load could cost NZ$4. And the time it takes to get your undies back, scented and crisply folded, reflects how little sleep they get.

In fact, laundry lists are full of helpful shopping information. If ladies' shorts and trousers aren't on the list, you shouldn't wear them in public. The reverse doesn't necessarily apply – otherwise you'll be stocking up on lehenga, kebaya and safari suits, which you will regret.

Looking back, you'll decide that many travelers who write online reviews are nuts. Otherwise excellent places are written off because the shower dripped. It doesn't occur to them that the staff whose English they whine about speak English far better than New Zealand hospitality workers speak Hindi.

And when you're home, life will suddenly seem so dull you'll long for a few exotic irritations. ■

Friends indeed

In AD Miller's new novel, a couple of mates are haunted by the very ties that bind them. by STEPHEN JEWELL

When I meet Andrew "AD" Miller in a bar in a London bookshop, I can't help but think we could be two pals discussing old times over drinks. For the 40-year-old's second novel The Faithful Couple centres around a pair of good mates, whose two-decade association is drastically altered by an incident that occurs shortly after they first cross paths in a San Diego youth hostel.

"Friendship in general is not written about enough in contemporary fiction, although 19th-century authors were fascinated by it," says Miller, citing the examples of Herman Melville, Mark Twain and Jane Austen. "That might have been because relations between the sexes were much more constrained back then, so public encounters and adventures typically involved friends rather than lovers or spouses. But when you consider what an important feature friendship is in most of our lives and how intrinsically dramatic most long-standing friendships can be, it's funny that it tends to get relegated to the subplot of most fiction, rather than becoming the focus of the storyline."

In this "very fertile territory for fiction", the irresponsible actions of the novel's main protagonists, Neil and Adam, help to hold them together before eventually contributing to tearing them apart.

"The book is also about guilt, because quite early on in their acquaintance they behave in ways that they come to very much regret. But all friendships are like conspiracies in the sense that we all know things about our friends that nobody else does. Friendships are always based on secrets. They all involve an element of affectionate blackmail, whereby we know things about our friends and they know things about us that we wouldn't necessarily like other people to know."

The Faithful Couple begins with Neil and Adam embarking on a road trip to San Francisco before becoming ill-advisedly involved with a teenage girl during a camping trip to Yosemite National Park. The book takes its name

With the majority of the novel set in London, Miller charts Adam and Neil's rise – and indeed fall – through the ranks of their respective workplaces. "What I've tried to do is to measure their friendship against their other relationships, which includes their office relationships," says Miller. "We all have these relationships at work, which we regard as inessential and superficial. But in another way, they're actually very important because our colleagues are the people we probably spend most of our waking life with."

Miller also compares their bond to those between romantic partners. "The main distinction to the ones that they have with their families – both biological and with their spouses – is that it feels to them that their friendship has been a choice," he says. "It's a discretionary thing that they've chosen freely to share with one another, as opposed to their family relationships, which can feel like an obligation. What happens to them over the course of their relationship is something that happens to a lot of long-term friends, which is that what starts as a choice can sometimes turn into an obligation because if you've known someone for a long time, it can be very hard to part ways, even if you've got a really good reason to do so."

"Friendships are always based on secrets. They all involve an element of affectionate blackmail."

Shortlisted for the 2011 Booker Prize, Miller's debut novel, Snowdrops, was inspired by his stint as the Economist's Moscow correspondent. Whereas Snowdrops took the form of a thriller – for which it was criticised after its Booker nomination for apparently representing a dumbing down of the prestigious literary award – The Faithful Couple adopts a more episodic structure. Similar to David Nicholls' One Day – which Miller says he hasn't read "but I believe it's been fairly successful, so I'm not going to complain" – the narrative drops in on Neil and Adam every two or three years between 1993 and 2011.

"I've tried in the margins of the novel to give a sense of how London changed in the 90s and the noughties," says Miller. "Those boom years of the wild roller-coaster economy transformed not only the physical fabric of the city but also the lives of the characters. What happens to them is what happened to a lot of people back then in that they make a lot of decisions in their early twenties and then find themselves in a very different situation, certainly in financial terms."

Admitting that he "set myself a challenge in having these leaps in time", Miller fills in some of what has happened to them in the intervening period but leaves the reader to figure out the rest. Crucially, he doesn't return significantly to the plot line of the young woman, whose eventual fate haunts Neil and Adam from the background, rather than becoming the driving force of the story.

"One thing I've tried to show is how when we're young, we don't give a lot of thought to the consequences of our actions. In the manner of young people who are in their twenties, they're fairly blithe about the impact their behaviour might have on others. What happened in California does incrementally catch up with them, particularly when Adam becomes a parent. That's something a lot of readers will relate to because becoming a parent can change your past as well as your future and can lead to a revision of your moral outlook, which is what happens to Adam. A bit like in Snowdrops, I don't offer a way out towards the end of the story because life doesn't tend to offer those kinds of consolations." ■ from an ancient pair of giant interwoven sequoias. "The trees themselves are a sort of metaphor for their relationship as they're locked together in a kind of permanent competition, but at the same time, if you took one away, the other would instantly collapse," says Miller. "There's a kind of co-dependency there as well as a rivalry, which is emblematic of what a lot of friendships end up being like."

Dangerous memories

Enduring love, irretrievable loss – Kazuo Ishiguro has it down pat, says PAULA MORRIS.

Kazuo Ishiguro's first novel since the dystopian Never Let Me Go (2005), The Buried Giant is another compelling foray into speculative fiction, though this time the Britain of the book isn't a distorted version of the present – the setting is a fantastical version of Britain in the mid-sixth century.

The Romans have been gone for over a century, leaving behind ruined villas and the remnants of civilisation. Invading Saxons have colonised the east, and King Arthur, the Britons' champion, is long dead. Though a belligerent lord in his castle and a particularly sinister monastery play roles in the novel, Britain is a backwards land of thick forests and rocky hillsides, peopled with pagan Saxons and Christian Britons living in tiny settlements. They're suspicious of each other and afraid of everything else – wolves, bears, ogres, demons, giant dog-like beasts, malevolent pixies, dragons. And because this is a fantasy novel, not an Iron-Age Wolf Hall, ogres and their frightening ilk are real menaces, not fairy tales, despite the fairy-tale-like structure of the book.

When the novel begins, there's peace among the tribes because no one remembers the past: "It had somehow faded into mist as dense as that which hung over the marshes." Stumbling through this dream-like mist is an elderly couple, Axl and Beatrice, on a perilous journey to find a son they can barely recall.

The obscuring mist that has hidden history is linked with the fierce she-dragon Querig, so this odyssey has many dangers, physical and supernatural. Axl and Beatrice face many of them alongside travelling companions on complex quests of their own: Wistan, an accomplished Saxon warrior on a secret mission for his lord back in the fens; Edwin, a possessed pariah of a boy who's both hunter and bait; and an old Sir Gawain, last survivor of Arthur's inner circle, creaky in his rusted armour but still loyal to Arthur and Merlin and determined to do his duty.

Memory and forgetting, confronting the atrocities of the past, enduring love, irretrievable loss – this is familiar territory for Ishiguro. He sent Stevens the butler off on such a journey in The Remains of the Day, and detective Christopher Banks on his own deluded quest in When We Were Orphans. In The Buried Giant, memory is a far more dangerous thing; there's no peace and reconciliation in this absorbing and disturbing novel, once the past is summoned from the mist. ■

Best laid plans

BERNARD CARPINTER'S round-up of the latest crime novels.

If something can go wrong, it goes spectacularly wrong in THE WHITE VAN, by Patrick Hoffman (Grove, $36.99). First, Russian mobsters plan to rob a bank in San Francisco, manipulating drugs enthusiast Emily Rosario into a lead role. When that goes haywire, desperate broke cop Leo Elias concocts a plan to steal the money from Emily, who has gone underground to escape the Russians. Fatalities follow as the characters' plans prove as flawed as the characters themselves – and these characters are very flawed indeed. This is a book full of surprises, energetic, forceful and hugely readable.

GUN STREET GIRL (Serpent's Tail, $36.99) is the fourth in Adrian McKinty's excellent series featuring Sean Duffy, a Catholic cop in Belfast during the Troubles of the 1980s. This one starts with the murder of a wealthy couple, apparently shot by their own son, and then the riots after the announcement of the Anglo-Irish agreement that infuriates extremists on both sides. Duffy goes to a church social, only to be shunned by women not interested in a man in constant danger of being killed. McKinty does plot, character and dry humour brilliantly, but his greatest accomplishment is his evocation of a time and place of vicious insanity.

MEDEA'S CURSE, by Anne Buist (Text, $37) could be described as a psychiatric thriller. Natalie King is a psychiatrist in Melbourne and a bit unusual herself – she rides a big Ducati, sings in a rock band, generally rocks boats and does not always take the medication for her own manic-depressive condition. Her caseload includes women convicted or accused of killing their own children and Natalie wants to know to what extent the women's partners were responsible for the deaths; she thinks the women could be covering up for their men. Solid going at times, this is a tough, different and interesting book.

Two burnt corpses in London are found to be assemblages of body parts from four different people, hence the title of JIGSAW MAN, by Elena Forbes (Text, $37). Detective Mark Tartaglia and his team make agonisingly slow progress while the media – led by a particularly annoying journalist – go to town on the case. Meanwhile ex-cop Sam Donovan, formerly a close friend of Tartaglia's, strikes out on her own to investigate the murder of her sister Claire. Standard police procedural in the British vein, but better than most thanks to Forbes' examination of relationships, which makes the characters come alive.

BLOOD, WINE & CHOCOLATE, by Kiwi writer Julie Thomas (HarperCollins, $34.99), sees Vinnie and his beloved wife, Anna, flee their home in London after Vinnie gives evidence in the murder trial of a crime boss whom he had known as a child. Under a witness protection programme, they change their names and come to New Zealand, where Anna makes chocolate and they buy a winery on Waiheke Island. But the bad guys are so enraged that they come all this way to seek revenge ... The novel is not quite as good as its title, but makes satisfying light entertainment. ■

Putin's new clothes

Democracy and the rule of law are mere slogans in this terrifying depiction of modern Russia.

by NICHOLAS REID

Over the last twenty years we've lived through a communism we never believed in, democracy and default, and mafia state and oligarchy, and we realised that they are illusions, that everything is PR."

These sentiments are very postmodern ("perception is everything"). They are also both despairing and cynical. They are spoken by a "liberal" Russian intellectual who has gone over to working for Vladimir Putin's PR apparatus. His views aren't unique. As Peter Pomerantsev reports in this frankly terrifying travel book, they are typical of modern Russia.

Ideals – such as democracy and the rule of law – are merely dishonest politicians' slogans. Therefore, you believe in nothing, keep your head down, do not criticise the regime and make as much money as you can – or at least as much as you can before police take it in the bribes on which they depend, and before state-controlled gangsters smash up your business or take it over.

Former KGB men (like Putin) pose as modern, liberal and open to new ideas, while playing the same old control games.

Peter Pomerantsev covers such things as the selling of army recruits and the grooming of provincial girls.

And the welfare of others and the good of society? Well, we don't believe in foolish slogans like those, do we? We leave it to a strong leader to sort things out.

Pomerantsev is the son of dissidents who fled to London as refugees in the Soviet era. They truly believed in democracy and had high hopes for the post-Soviet state. Pomerantsev went to Russia in the late 1990s, stayed for over a decade and worked for a TV channel producing sensationalist drivel that mimicked the worst of Western "reality" TV. He makes regular trips back.

His detailed reportage on Russia ranges from chapters on the routine mistreatment of army recruits (beaten up and sold as labour to entrepreneurs by their officers) to tales of girls from the provinces grooming themselves to snare the new class of (gangster) Muscovite millionaires. The supporting cast includes Muslim girls from the Caucasus who see becoming suicide bombers or prostitutes in Moscow as equal options.

But the focus is on the Kremlin's new ruling class. Former KGB men (like Putin) pose as modern, liberal and open to new ideas, while playing the same old control games. Opposition parties are allowed – so long as they are covertly controlled by the government. Satire is permitted on television – so long as real government scandals aren't mentioned and names aren't named. Set up by presidential decree, TV channels like Russia Today look almost like the standard Western mix of trivia, sport and entertainment – except that all their news is crafted state propaganda.

How does Putin emerge from this? As a man who wants to rebuild the old Russian empire while clothing himself in forms of democracy and consent that have been stripped of all meaning. The first post-modern dictator. ■

NOTHING IS TRUE AND EVERYTHING IS POSSIBLE: ADVENTURES IN MODERN RUSSIA, by Peter Pomerantsev (Faber & Faber, $36.99).

Chigozie Obioma: takes the personal and makes it universal.

Brothers in arms

Nigeria in flux is mirrored in a tale of four boys and a madman.

by MICHELLE LANGSTONE

Chigozie Obioma's debut novel takes place in the town of Akure, Nigeria, where the author was born. That deep connection allows him to build a world for the reader that is layered and fibrous, the homes and streets and shaded places all singing with the narrator's familiarity. The truism that what is most personal is also most universal seems made for this story – one so intimate and familial, yet blown apart with a largesse of themes that run to redemption, loyalty and vengeance.

When a shift in family dynamics takes their father to another city, the four Agwu boys are left to test their mother's boundaries. Their wilful teenage disobedience and lack of caution leads them to a chance encounter with a lunatic who delivers a prophecy of death that throws a pall over their adolescence; suddenly the brothers are faced off against one another with rapidly escalating tension and threat. Benjamin, the youngest, narrates the story.

Obioma allows the boy a dogged truthfulness in his role, though the telling is a burden that rests heavily on his small shoulders, stealing his childhood away even as he undertakes it, thanks to a brutal and unnatural rite of passage. The author's handling here is clever and sensitive: his narrator tries hard to be reliable, but his tender years mean he intuitively events with a bitter-sweet naivety and the subtleties can't help but be lost on him.

The Fishermen is sharp with vibrancy and ripples with foreboding. The elemental life of Africa is as vivid and freshly masculine as the young boys who inhabit it. The sinewy physicality and rages of the young men mirror the changing political face of Nigeria in the 90s, the restlessness and uncertainty of a territory in flux.

Obioma adroitly captures the fears of a small, deeply religious, churchgoing community; the whispers and speculations, the superstitions. Those notions – curses, predestination, sin – lend the story a biblical quality, and the weight of such fears eventually tip the balance of good and evil. The Fisherman advances at pace towards a conclusion that blends mythology and violence with a yearning for innocence. ■

Fully formed

SARAH QUIGLEY
reviews collections from four New Zealand poets.

A friend who works in the frenetic world of internet fashion told me recently that reading poetry is the best way she knows of “slowing the pulse”. I thought of this as I read John Dennison’s Otherwise. For in examining the passing of time, these meditative poems also make sense of it. With their measured tone and precision of language, they steady the “squirrelling, querulous heart”.

It’s rare to come across a poetic debut as assured as this, and a pleasure to surrender to the poet’s skill. These are finely wrought, formal poems that are nonetheless accessible. Often Dennison begins colloquially – “Late, you don’t know the half” – and segues into a philosophical context where the brief flares of individual existence are both celebrated and subsumed.

Settings range from Scotland to Calcutta, literary references from TS Eliot to our own “Jim Baxter”. The depth of vision and the rich language are reminiscent of Seamus Heaney – so I was hardly surprised, halfway through the collection, to come across an impressive triptych dedicated to the Irish poet.

The collection’s final poem, The Extra Mile, is the most personal, with its endearing image of the narrator born with feet curling like “ponga fronds”. It’s a remarkable achievement: each image plays off and extends what has come before, and the last lines read like a personal credo: “what is done has entered me,/left me longing for the extra mile”. What’s so impressive here is that the poetic quest, and the monumental task of creating, appear effortless.

Geoff Cochrane’s new collection – his 15th – is like a polar opposite to Dennison’s. Wonky Optics is characterised by a fizzing, crackling energy, an irreverent humour and a casual delight in words: “I’m under the influence of influenza.” Cochrane also leaps exuberantly between forms. Some prose poems run to several pages, whereas other poems are just a couple of lines long – such as the short, lilting, gorgeously nonsensical Spring: “Scented gusts that bring us sweet elsewhere./With up so floating many bells down, somehow.”

Anna Jackson is well-established on the New Zealand literary landscape, and a new book from her is always a treat. I, Clodia, and Other Portraits is vintage Jackson, blending classical source material with a witty, colloquial and utterly contemporary style.

The "Clodia" of the title is Clodia Metelli, widely accepted to be the "Lesbia" of Catullus's famous love poems. Under Jackson's deft touch, she springs into life; her poetic voice, like Catullus's own, is variously passionate, tender, sharp and defiant: "Do you think I have nothing to do but wait lonely/for you to return with your limping iambics ...?" In this striking sequence, she's revealed as a classical heroine for a modern age, pronouncing on gossip, infidelity and love.

The collection's second half, The Pretty Photographer, consists of a series of poetic portraits. Sylvia in the Supermarket talks of her "winning son"; The Politician's Wife has a room she likes to call her study – "though I do not study"; The Proof-reader After Hours worries about a missing comma. These poems are sharply objective, emotionally engaging and often profoundly moving. In a world of talented copy-artists, Jackson is that rare thing – a true original. Her poetry never fails to surprise and inform.

Tom Weston's Only One Question displays a similar ingenuity regarding the use of literary sources. Everything is Pointless echoes a letter written by Flaubert to the much younger Maupassant, his "literary nephew". In this deliciously funny poem, Weston adopts and subverts Flaubert's admonitory voice. "Do not/yield to reality", says "Uncle to Nephew Guy"; "give up melancholy, a useless delusion ... And welcome to Art, you Numbskull".

Weston's literary-historical references range from the early 19th-century French writer Chateaubriand to the American modernist Hart Crane and Kafka – whose novel The Castle is the starting point for the satirical An Excellent Arrangement. Here, in a perfect parody of official complaint-filing, Weston captures the infuriating illogic of bureaucracy – adding wryly in an afternote that Kafka would find post-earthquake Christchurch "congenial".

In spite of his frequent use of humour, Weston – as he usually does – tackles serious topics. The central preoccupation of this collection is the passage of time, "the short space/we each inherit", and the impossibility of finding answers to the "one question". You get the feeling that the formal structure of the poems is one way of managing the unmanageable; reassurance lies in the absolute mastery of language and form. And even as the poet asserts that "with each small wave we lose another chance", he offers redemption, celebrating the very humanness that is ultimately our downfall. ■

by MARK BROATCH

We meet John Wick tumbling out of his car, face battered, blood oozing from a deep gut wound. His seemingly last act is to watch a video of his wife on his phone. She died of some terrible disease, it transpires, but in a selfless display of posthumous generosity arranged for him to be sent a puppy. He loves that puppy. A chance encounter at a gas station – he's filling his covetable classic Mustang – leads to a brutal break-in at his house. Dog lovers should look away.

Enough sentimental backstory. We're here to see Keanu Reeves in one-man-army revenge mode, and thanks to Wick's devil-ishly shady past, that's pretty much what we get from this point on. In those lovingly choreographed displays of ultraviolence (fists and feet, guns, knives, vehicles), John Wick is actually a bit of a blast. Yet there's so much wrong with this film – its pacing, editing, writing and acting, to start with.

Then there's the shambling story, complete with cruel Russian gangsters, a Wanted-style secret society and a music video aesthetic that appears and disappears as if on shuffle. Much of Wick's life is unexplained and unexplainable. Sometimes Reeves' lack of affect is a boon, but most of the time here he looks as wooden as a chest of drawers, and he really doesn't have the gravitas to play someone everyone fears. But then there are moments of cinematic excellence, weird dark humour, flickers of Reeves' minimalist genius, Willem Dafoe elegantly slumming as Wick's pal and Michael Nyquist's Russian mob leader working himself up to a matchlessly macho showdown. Rein it in a bit and I'd watch a sequel.

MUSIC

by Nick Bollinger

Divine inspiration

Sean James Donnelly's mysterious new album even has its own spirit guide.

I used to love just cradling that bit of slightly fermented cardboard in my hands and sniffing it, to eke out the mystery of the music within, a lot of the time gloriously short of details ..."

Sean James Donnelly is reliving the semi-mystical experience of listening to music back when an album was an object one bonded with – from the printed cover to the sounds within – rather than today's fleeting online experience. Under the name SJD, the moniker he has used since his first independent releases 17 years ago, he has just completed an album that feels as mysterious, talismanic and permanent as the classics he remembers. And like those albums, Saint John Divine comes in a package that curiously amplifies the music.

The cover illustration is Reading the Bird Entrails, a painting by Dunedin artist Kushana Bush that depicts a bearded, hatted figure addressing a group of men, women and children while holding the intestines of a bird he clutches by the neck. Donnelly and Bush met in 2013 when they were each recipients of an Arts Foundation New Generation Award. Says Donnelly: "She said, 'I have this painting I think might fit', and it just spoke to so many of the themes that are in the album, not least the fact that the album is called Saint John Divine. It gave another meaning to the word "divining". And the first song is called I Saw the Future. So many of those threads were tied together.

"I saw this guy just walking through the album. Sometimes he's the subject of the song; sometimes he's just observing; sometimes he's a spirit guide, if you like. I really hope it's something that will encourage people to listen to the album, because if I saw a cover like that, I'd want to listen."

Sonically, Saint John Divine might be the opposite of Donnelly's last record, 2012's Elastic Wasteland, which he created single-handedly using synthesizers and drum machines.

With its echoes of Soft Cell and early Human League, it was, he says, his homage to the synth-pop he has always loved. Saint John Divine, by contrast, is both the most organic and warmly produced album Donnelly has made. At its heart is a live band that includes Neil Finn and ingenious drummer Chris O'Connor, enhanced by a chorus of female vocalists, soaring string overdubs and indefinable sonic embellishments.

What's most striking is the richness of the songwriting. The early SJD albums are full of what Donnelly calls "little songs with big backyards"; the lyrics and vocal lines, although evocative, seem no more important than the lavish instrumental framing. But on Saint John Divine, the song is central. You could strip everything back to a voice and a guitar and these songs would still stand majestically.

As always, a blanket of melancholy hovers over the whole thing. In songs such as Jet Planes and Invisible Man, Donnelly's "spirit guide" reports from some dark places. Yet frequently a big bright chorus will burst through the cloud cover, as in I Wanna Be Foolish – with its crescendo of wordless ahhs dialling up both Twist and Shout and Let's Dance – and the crazily catchy Little Pieces, performed as a duet with Julia Deans.

Donnelly's career as SJD has been interspersed with periods playing supporting roles in the bands of higher-profile songwriters such as Don McGlashan and Neil Finn. It was Finn who suggested it was time for Donnelly to take centre stage again and acted as a sounding board throughout the making of the album. I can't help but think that if everyone who has ever loved a Neil Finn album gets to hear Saint John Divine, the world will be a fairer and a happier place. ■

Now or never

The first studio album in 10 years from Trinity Roots borders on bombast and makes no apologies for it. In the opening song, Bully, Warren Maxwell sings to the “basher fella, basher sister” who perpetrate domestic violence, backing up his message with an ancient three-note Maori melody and a metal riff reminiscent of Black Sabbath. In title track, Citizen, he mocks the rich and soulless and mourns the distances between neighbours, while jazz pianist James Illingworth runs virtuosic rings around a slow skanking groove.

Not that political statement is new to the group, whose Home, Land and Sea addressed the foreshore and seabed debate, or that they have never mixed genres or stretched out musically before. But these new tracks are more solemn and studied than anything on the group's two earlier studio efforts, as though the revived group – with Ben Lemi replacing original drummer Riki Gooch – are fuelled by a feeling of now or never. And the urgency is maintained in El Kaptain, a musical relative of Bob Marley's War, in which Maxwell conjures a maritime image for an arrogant leader who won't hear the cries of his crew. But there are reflective, soulful performances too, as in Maxwell's bossa-tinged Clarity and Herbs-flavoured Haiku, and Lemi provides the album's gentlest moments with two acoustic meditations: They Fall and Musings of a Cloud.

Trinity Roots: soulful, studied.

A Movement is a weighty title for a weighty artefact: a 10-volume boxed set of books documenting the past decade and a half of live New Zealand music through the photographs of Ian Jorgensen. As the promoter of many local gigs, tours and events, Jorgensen was well placed to capture this multitude of moments. But a lesser eye would have missed the energy, passion and humour that radiates from these images.

FILM

Made to measure

A charming doco designed with just the right blend of humour and heart.

DIOR AND I

directed by Frédéric Tcheng

At first, the “I” in the title seems obvious. The film’s about Belgian designer Raf Simons, newly appointed artistic director of Christian Dior, making his 2012 debut collection. But is it? The words in the opening voice-over are Dior’s, taken from his memoirs, referring to his “Siamese twin”. Does he mean Simons? No, he’s talking about the private Dior and the public Dior. So perhaps “I” is the former? Or even the latter?

The confusion is deliberate. Frédéric Tcheng, who worked on documentaries about Valentino and Diana Vreeland, uses it to play with parallels between the two designers. Visually, he creates a sense of the older man hovering near the younger, a fleeting presence glimpsed in reflective surfaces and the dresses themselves. It’s cinematic, artful and surprisingly moving.

Meanwhile, there’s a collection to be produced in eight weeks. Besides the ticking clock, there are tensions: how will the new boy go down with the long-serving workers in the atelier and how will he handle his anxieties? It’s his first attempt

Something so strong

The New Zealand International Film Festival gets it right again.

by David Larsen

Two major new documentaries, one Kiwi, one Australian. Big-screen showings of five classic films. The verb “curate” is sadly overused in today’s popular culture, but it has its proper place: the New Zealand International Film Festival programmers know how to curate a mini-festival so there’s something for everyone.

The Ground We Won is from the directing team who made the beautifully insightful documentary How Far is Heaven. These are important film-makers working in the underserved area of rural and small-town New Zealand, and here they mine a vein of pure social-commentary gold: they follow a season in the life of a provincial rugby team.

In That Sugar Film, Australian Damon Gameau wants to get to grips with the prevalence of sugar in the Western diet and its health consequences. He talks to medical experts and nutritionists, and goes the Morgan Spurlock stunt-diet route, eating 40 teaspoons of sugar a day – sourced only from food sold as “healthy” – and showing us the consequences.

And then the classics. Oh, the classics.

Dior and I: dignity, not drama.

at haute couture.

Such a high-stakes endeavour suggests high drama; at the very least slammed-down irons or needles at five paces. But the modus operandi here is collaboration, not conflict. In the haute cuisine equivalent, it's more El Bulli's Ferran Adrià than Gordon Ramsay – the silence of concentration and creation, the co-operative solving of problems.

In lieu of drama, Tchong focuses on the people, in particular Florence and Monique, the premières in charge of the workrooms. Watching them operate, and handle stress, we see how their personalities allow for compromise and mutual respect. Maybe it's their artisan heritage and the staff being mostly women, but it's a refreshing glimpse of old-fashioned dignity in the workplace.

As for Simons, he knows what he wants and is stubborn about getting it, but he's also an introvert, almost painfully so. Words and pictures expose his internal conflict as the showing, with its attendant public exposure, looms. We empathise closely, partly because he's an antidote to our fatigue with self-promoting celebrity, and partly because by now we too are invested in the show's success. We watch with him and his workers as the models stalk in procession towards the showroom, clad in their gorgeous outfits, and when his tension visibly dissolves, it's a touching climax. It's also one in which he takes full possession of the "I". ★★★★★

OPENS APRIL 2

Films are rated out of 5:

★ (abysmal) to ★★★★★ (amazing).

Clockwise from top left: The Ground We Won; 2001: A Space Odyssey; A Hard Day's Night; That Sugar Film.

Short personal anecdote: last year the festival's Autumn Events programme included one of my favourite films, The Third Man. I'd never seen it on the big screen before. I discovered that one sequence I'd never quite been able to love is in fact a masterpiece of pure visual storytelling – when you see it on a large enough screen.

Of the five classics this year, the only one I've seen the way it was meant to be seen is Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (three times. I'll go again. Obviously). There's also Kubrick's great toga epic, Spartacus; Bertolucci's anti-fascist political-thriller masterpiece The Conformist; a fully remastered digital restoration of The Beatles' A Hard Day's Night; and – are you ready for this, parents? – Disney's Pinocchio. ■

Life as we know it

Crackpots, convicts and complete cock-ups – reality TV has never been so real.

Poor old TV3 is enduring a battering. Still recovering from the X Factor controversy sparked by Natalia Kills' and Willy Moon's proprietary feelings toward suits, the broadcaster is being hammered over its choice of contestants for The Bachelor. First, it was revealed that Danielle Le Galais has a fraud conviction, then Danielle

Robinson was found to have been convicted of a drink-driving offense.

But does TV3 deserve the outrage directed at it? Surely it's done us all a favour. First, expectant parents now know to think twice before calling their newborns Danielle, and second, the channel's put the "reality" back in "reality TV". Dating is a minefield peppered with convicts, crackpots and 40-year-olds who live with their mothers. The Bachelor is merely reflecting the harsh realities of the hunt for love. TV3 publicists, put an end to this fiasco by issuing a press release that simply says, "We're keeping it real, yo."

✚ Author and actress Jenny Mollen (who's married to American Pie star Jason Biggs) is releasing a follow-up to her bestselling book I Like You Just The Way I Am: Stories About Me and Some Other People. And with her star on the rise (Sony TV has optioned the book and she's expected to play herself) and anticipation over new book Live Fast, Die Hot building, her friends are keeping her grounded. Among the many congratulatory messages she received from fans on Twitter was this one from one of her mates, writer Ollly Cromack: "Congratulations to my dear friend @jennyaandteets on the announcement of her 2nd book! This is the inspiration I needed to buy the 1st book."

✚ There must be inspiration in the water in Tinseltown, because a host of previously untitled films have all just been named. Steven Spielberg's Cold War thriller, starring Tom Hanks, has been called Bridge of Spies; Asif Kapadia's documentary on the late Amy Winehouse has been entitled Amy; and the third instalment of the Sharknado series, featuring Tara Reid and Ian Ziering, has received a less subtle moniker: Sharknado 3: Oh Hell No!

✚ There can no longer be any dispute: Sir Paul McCartney is definitely the hippest septuagenarian in the world. Since turning 72, the former Beatle has collaborated with Rihanna and Kanye West, written soundtracks for Xbox and PlayStation shooter games and made a 360-degree recording of one of his concerts to create a virtual reality experience. And now he's gone and released a 3D-printable mini-me version of himself for fans to download. It's all terribly impressive, but he won't be boosting the egos of any senior citizens struggling with their TV remotes.

✚ That Naomi Watts is a sensible type. Forget those method actors doing their own stunts – the Australian actress told the LA Times she would always use a stunt double and that she wasn't the least bit envious of her Insurgent co-stars landing all the sci-fi film's combat scenes. "After I did King Kong, that was sort of the end of my ingénue days and I don't really want to get beaten up any more. I'm quite happy to be the person in the background and watch it all play out before me." ■

North might have bid 4H on the first round, directly over West's weak jump overcall. Since he had three top cards and only three-card trump support, it was more accurate to start with a negative double. How would you play the heart game when West leads the ten of diamonds? Declarer won the diamond lead in dummy and ran the nine of trumps successfully. A second trump finesse was followed by the ace of trumps, exhausting the defenders' cards in the suit. What now? All would be well if the club suit broke 3-2, so declarer turned his mind to how he could deal with the situation where East held four clubs. He crossed to dummy with a diamond and ruffed a diamond in his hand.

He then tested the club suit by cashing the king and the ace. When West showed out on the second round, declarer led dummy's last diamond. East showed out and the key moment had been reached. Instead of ruffing the diamond, declarer discarded one of his club losers. West won the trick and had only spades in his hand. Whether he exited with the ace or queen of spades, declarer would score the king and lose only one trick in the suit. Game made.

Wordsworth

by Michael Collins

Readers were asked to write an original poem whose first line is "When I am an old woman/man I shall ...", as per Jenny Joseph's classic poem Warning. This must have touched a nerve: the competition attracted the most entries in a long time. Helensville's Anne Martin clearly captured the pensioner's plight: When I am an old woman I shall don/Fishnet tights and go out on/The streets at night - oh, did I mention?/It's just to supplement me pension. Kerikeri's Al Willis: When I am an old woman/man I shall/Spend my pension on boxes of tissues/To soak up the tears of regret for/My years of gender identity issues.

Welcome Bay's Elaine Cullen: When I'm an old woman, I shall ditch the old man/And trawl through the nightclubs while I still can/In search of a toy boy who's willing to be/A plaything and muse to a wealthy old me./Together we'll dine on the finest of food,/Drinking champagne to sweeten the mood,/Till the day does dawn and this old bird is tired./The toy boy's released, his contract has expired.

But this week's winner is Onetangi's Margaret Mills: When I am an old woman I shall know what to do./I'll walk along the beach for at least an hour or two./Then I'll write a bit and maybe read a book/Or go and do some gardening, find something new to cook./Will I still feel the joy of simply being alive?/I'll just have to wait and see - I'm only eighty-five.

The next competition is in a similar vein, but inspired by Ogden Nash's A Word to Husbands (To keep your marriage brimming/With love in the loving cup,/Whenever you're wrong, admit it;/Whenever you're right, shut up): come up with an original four-line poem that begins "To keep your marriage ..." Entries, for the prize below, close noon, Thursday, April 9.

Submissions to wordsworth@listener.co.nz or Wordsworth, NZ Listener, Private Bag 92512, Wellesley St, Auckland 1141. Please include your address.

That's Entertainment

Radio with pictures

Paul Henry is soon to be simulcast all over the shop – expect the unexpected. by entertainment editor FIONA RAE

Welcome to the brave new world of broadcasting. Maybe. The multi-platform, all-singing, all-dancing, television-radio-internet many-headed beast that is Paul Henry (TV3, weekdays from Tuesday, 6.00am) starts this week.

The three-hour breakfast show will simultaneously go out on TV3, RadioLive and paulhenry.co.nz in what might be a worldwide first.

"We've looked everywhere to find someone who's done this, but we can't," says Henry. "Howard Stern was doing a radio programme on television, and that's starting to knock on the door of the sort of thing we're looking at doing."

Although Henry says they're still working through the technical aspects, probably "right up to day one", the studio will be "quite different to the way a traditional television studio works. This is definitely not putting television cameras in a radio studio."

The idea is that Paul Henry will be accessible everywhere, a bit like the way on-demand television works: television, radio, computer.

"The reason we've created all these different platforms is for the convenience of the audience. I don't need to beg people to stay in their living room to watch it or to stay sitting in their car to listen to it, because we're on every platform."

Also on the team are newsreader Hilary Barry, sports presenter Jim Kayes and internet whiz Perlina Lau.

"You can do things specifically for the internet that you can't do for radio or television," says Henry, although he's leaving that stuff up to Lau. "She'll be the voice of the audience and an advocate for people engaging with the programme through social media."

Henry believes this combined approach to broadcast media is inevitable given the fragmentation of the market. "Look at radio," he says. "If your radio format was 100% successful and attracted every single target listener, it still wouldn't be enough to break even."

Paul Henry "makes perfect sense for MediaWorks" and might even be a template for the future of news shows. "If it works," says Henry. "No one else has ever done it, so maybe it's not. Maybe there's a very good reason no one else has ever done it."

It's going to be a challenge, but Henry says he doesn't get nervous any more – "It's only TV, it's only radio, you know?" And even though he's known for sticking his foot in his mouth on occasion, he says he'll "just be myself. I'm not going to try to be anything. I certainly won't try to be careful." ■

EASTER SUNDAY

The Secret Life of Cats (TV1, 7.00pm). With so many videos on the internet, you'd think there wasn't much left to know about cats, yet here's a National Geographic doco claiming that they have a secret life. The programme also covers how these little devils wheedled their way into our affections by cunningly catching rats in barns, and their verging-on-supernatural abilities, such as ultraviolet vision, an in-built gyroscope that tells them which way is down in a 10th of a second and whiskers that act as barometers. With all those skills, the question isn't so much are they plotting to overthrow humankind, but why haven't they done it yet?

EASTER MONDAY

Shortland Street (TV2, 7.00pm). There's a whiff of the Friends episode The One Where Dr Ramoray Dies about tonight's instalment of Shortie in which Pua Magasiva's character Vinnie dons a giant bunny suit and nearly drowns in a paddling pool. Pua, have you been annoying the writers?

Silent Witness (Prime, 9.35pm). Season 15 already. It seems like only yesterday that Amanda Burton was being serious Sam Ryan in Cambridge and French and Saunders were making fun of her with their "Witless Silence" sketch. Emilia Fox has been the lead since season eight and appears to be happy to carry on, but not so her co-star Tom Ward (Dr Harry Cunningham), who hangs up his plastic pinny at the end of this season (he went on to be Colonel Peaky Blinders, Friday.

Fitzwilliam in the recent adaptation of Death Comes to Pemberley). The season begins with a story partly based on a real serial-killer mystery known as the Phantom of Heilbronn case.

Richard E Grant's Hotel Secrets (Choice TV, 10.00pm). Naughty ole charmer Richard E Grant is back for a second season of poking around the world's flashiest hotels: nice work if you can get it. He's so fully aware of the absurdity of his surroundings that it's a delight to see him swanning around a US$32,000-a-night suite or pretending, with finger guns, to be James Bond, as he does in tonight's episode at one of Miami's most luxurious hotels, the Fontainebleau. This season, he's looking at more than one hotel in various cities, including Hong Kong, Berlin, New Orleans and Venice.

TUESDAY APRIL 7

Mad Men (SoHo, Sky 010, 7.30pm). Don Draper's slow march to self-awareness is nearly over. That, or he'll last be seen, à la the opening credits, plummeting to earth from a skyscraper window. The final seven episodes of the seventh season of Mad Men are called The End of an Era, a reference to the date (1969), the series' own end and, presumably, Draper (Jon Hamm), the ad man who took someone else's name and reinvented himself. As well as Don's story, creator Matthew Weiner has been excavating American history and the impact of the momentous events of the 1960s. "Martin Luther King and Bobby Kennedy being shot within months of each other," he explained to Rolling Stone, "our episode airs and Sandy Hook happens, like, the next day. Those kinds of things are kind of what I'm telling on the show, that we live in a violent country." Weiner has also charted the evolution of some of the women: Joan (Christina Hendricks) and Peggy (Elisabeth Moss) are in vastly different places than they were at the start.

The Red Road (Rialto, Sky 039, 8.30pm). We spy not one but two Kiwis in this Sundance Channel drama series: Martin Henderson reprises his role as cop Harold Jensen and Rena Owen pops up in season two as a Native American healer who is going to send Harold's alcoholic, schizophrenic wife Jean (Julianne Nicholson) on a head trip. As the season begins, Jason Momoa's Phillip Kopus returns to the Ramapo Mountains after a year in prison to find tension within his tribe over a proposal to build a casino, and Harold has been promoted but finds corruption in the force.

The Village (Vibe, Sky 008, 9.30pm). Peter Moffat's ambitious undertaking rolls on into the 1920s. Inspired by Heimat, a 1980s German series about

Documentaries by FIONA RAE

The clapped-out 1950s cars and crumbling Spanish architecture still exists in Cuba with Simon Reeve (Prime, Tuesday, 7.30pm), but with the freeing up of state controls on enterprise and a relaxation of restrictions on trade with the US, the tiny island nation is undergoing a big change.

British journalist Simon Reeve is in Cuba to see how the defiant nation so long at odds with America is faring under the new regime of Raúl Castro, who took over from his brother Fidel in 2008. The country is still not so free that Reeve is able to talk to just anyone, and after 50 years of Communist rule, the ordinary Cubans he does speak to dare not say a word against anything.

However, perhaps pictures speak louder than words. A man who sells plumbing supplies on the side of the road is supplementing his job as an accident and emergency doctor; another has set up a burger and pizza joint in his own home. A woman with a reasonably spacious house has to prop up its crumbling ceiling with scaffolding. Cubans, on the whole, seem to be embracing entrepreneurship, although the changes have come about a Rhineland village between 1919-82, the British writer is aiming to tell the story of a village in Derbyshire over the course of the 20th century. To be frank, it's been a bit bloody grim so far. Told from the point of view of youngster Bert Middleton, the first series began in 1914 and portrayed a miserable working-class life as Bert's parents (John Simm and Maxine Peake) struggled to make ends meet on their dairy farm. Reviews for season two suggest the 1920s are a bit more exciting, with the introduction of a dastardly press baron played by Julian Sands and the rise of the Labour Party offering some hope to the working classes.

WEDNESDAY APRIL 8

Resurrection (TV2, 10.30pm). "The zombie version of Brothers & Sisters," concluded Variety of this US series about the dead returning, apparently unharmed, in a small town in Missouri. Omar Epps is our guide through this confusing world, but with soap plots rather than genuine chills and frights, you might want to stick with the undead of The Walking Dead. At least they're not mysterious. Just hungry.

FRIDAY APRIL 10

Peaky Blinders (UKTV, Sky 007, 8.30pm). More working-class Britain in the 1920s, but Peaky Blinders is melodrama rather than kitchen sink. The violent, stylish and visually bold series returns for season two with even more star power: Tom Hardy joins the cast (from episode two) as a London gangster who may be part of the solution to Tommy Shelby's (Cillian Murphy) desired London expansion. There's also Darby Sabini – based on a real second-generation British-Italian gangster – who isn't best pleased about the Blinders' attempts to take over the London race tracks, and enraged copper Chester Campbell (Sam Neill, channeling Ian Paisley) who has a proposition for Tommy.

The series innovatively uses modern music, notably Nick Cave's Red Right Hand as a theme song, and tracks by PJ Harvey (including her version of Red Right Hand), the Kills, Arctic Monkeys, Johnny Cash and Laura Marling feature.

Mad Men, Tuesday.

because Castro has had to embark on austerity cuts in the public sector.

British archaeologist Jago Cooper is across the way from Cuba, although much further back in time in Lost Kingdoms of Central America (Choice TV, Easter Monday, 8.35pm). In this four-part series, he explores some of the forgotten civilisations of Central America, beginning in southern Mexico with the Americas' oldest, the Olmec. They thrived there more than 3000 years ago, built the first pyramid, created massive stone head sculptures and believed in supernatural transformation.

In the other three episodes, he investigates the Taíno of the Caribbean; the ancient people of Costa Rica, whose remaining legacy includes hundreds of giant stone spheres; and the Teotihuacán in Mexico, who built massive pyramids and temples and ruled for hundreds of years.

Catch of the Week

Monica Lewinsky: patient zero.

SHAME, SHAME, SHAME: Twitter pile-ons and social media shaming are happening almost every day, let alone the nasty threats meted out at the click of a button. What the hell is wrong with people? Monica Lewinsky has some ideas – she describes herself as “patient zero” in a recent TED talk: the first person to be shamed worldwide, the first time the traditional news was usurped by the internet. It's still going on, she notes – she's mentioned in at least 40 rap songs: tinyurl.com/NZLmonica

COMMA CHAMELEON: The internet may be full of self-ies, the self-obsessed and the outraged, but it's also a place where minutiae flourishes. Name any hobby or obsession and there's a website – and it's a word nerd's paradise. New Yorker copy editor Mary Norris recently wrote a personal history in the magazine about how she became a comma queen (her book is Between You & Me: Confessions of a Comma Queen) and now she's appearing in a video series on the website: tinyurl.com/NZLcomma

His mother, Rachel Faucette, the daughter of an Englishwoman and a Frenchman, (inherited) her father's Nova plantation at sixteen and was married off, very young, to Johann Michael Laven, an older Danish man with aspirations to be a planter.

WORD UP: Speaking of word nerdery, there are tons of free crosswords and other puzzles online that can be played in your browser or printed as PDFs. The Guardian has Quick, Cryptic, Speedy and Everyman, as well as Kakuro and Sudoku: tinyurl.com/NZLpuzzles. The Guardian Style Guide is also one of our favourites on Twitter: @guardianstyle. A Guide to the Week's Viewing

SATURDAY APRIL 4

Big (Four, 8.30pm). One of the best body-swap comedies, if not the best. By today's standards, Tom Hanks' 12-year-old is probably terribly naive, but his misinterpretations of the adult world are delightful and the walking piano keyboard scene in FAO Schwarz is now a part of movie history. (1988) ★★★★★

Safe Haven (TV2, 8.35pm). Lasse Hallström goes from a charming adaptation of Salmon Fishing in the Yemen to a big ol' Nicholas Sparks mess. There's a thriller element to the story, in which Julianne Hough washes up in an idyllic North Carolina town after escaping from apparently killing her husband, but the tone and direction vacillates between dewy-eyed romance with Josh Duhamel's widowed single father and a RoboCop pursuit by Boston detective David Lyons. There's also an ending that comes out of nowhere. Was Hallström on a sugar high? (2013) ★★★

In the Name of the Father (Maori, 9.35pm). Jim Sheridan, working with Daniel Day-Lewis for a second time, dramatises the shocking injustice perpetrated against the Guildford Four in 1974. Pete Postlethwaite and Day-Lewis play Giuseppe and Gerry Conlon, sent away for the IRA bombing that killed four soldiers and a civilian and injured 65. Both are incredible, and the film received seven Oscar nominations, including a supporting actress nod for Emma Thompson, who plays the campaigning lawyer who freed all those convicted. (1993) ★★★★★

The Suspicions of Mr Whicher: The Murder in Angel Lane (TV1, 10.35pm).

A fictional follow-up to 2011's The Murder at Road Hill – that was based on Kate Summerscale's book about a notorious 1860 murder in Wiltshire and the Scotland Yard detective who investigated. This story, invented by Neil McKay (who wrote See No Evil: The Moors Murders and biopic Mo) features Jack Whicher (Paddy Considine) now a "private inquiry agent" who is employed by Olivia Colman to search for her missing 16-year-old niece. Considine is sombre rather than flashy and Colman (Broadchurch) is not overly expressive either, but it's right up your blind alley if you enjoy Victorian gloom and lots of twists and turns. (2013) ★★★★★

Eat Pray Love (TV2, 10.55pm). It's difficult not to file this adaptation of Elizabeth Gilbert's memoir under First World Problems. Aw, the self-absorbed rich white woman is unhappy and needs to focus on herself with a round-the-world trip. The wattage of Julia Roberts' smile is undimmed and Javier Bardem is a fantasy-worthy holiday fling, but this is as shallow as a politician's promise. (2010) ★★★

EASTER SUNDAY

Oz the Great and Powerful* (TV2, 7.00pm). Everyone knows that the Wizard of Oz is a fraud, but Dorothy didn't find that out until the end of the movie. In this origin story, he (James Franco) starts out as a cheap circus magician swept into the magical CGI Land of Oz where there are witches (Mila Kunis, Michelle Williams and Rachel Weisz), flying baboons, a living china doll, scarecrows, Munchkins ... everything. Perhaps it's a bad idea to pull back the curtain quite this much. (2013) ★★★

Kath & Kimderella* (TV2, 9.15pm). Hated by Aussie critics, loved by Aussie audiences. Gina Riley and Jane Turner take their Fountain Lakes creations to Italy, where they're mistaken for royalty, and Sharon (Magda Szubanski) takes a liking to Richard E Grant. A thin joke spread thinner, quite possibly, but worth a giggle. Also starring Dame Edna, Elle Macpherson, Rob Sitch and our favourite of the Riley-Turner creations, Prue and Trude. (2012) ★★★

Beasts of the Southern Wild* (Maori, 9.30pm). Confusing, heartbreaking, damning, uplifting. The first feature by young American film-maker Benh Zeitlin is almost a sensory rather than a filmic experience, as he captures the world of six-year-old Hushpuppy (Quvenzhané Wallis, absolutely fierce). From the outside, there's utter poverty; from her point of view, she's living with her beloved father (New Orleans baker Dwight Henry) in the greatest place in the world, a Louisiana bayou they call the Bathtub. But a storm is brewing and the beasts unleashed by thawing ice caps are threatening their way of life. (2012) ★★★★★

Savages* (TV3, 9.40pm). There's no such thing as a restrained Oliver Stone film, and his return to the crime thriller is stuffed full of crooks, thugs, hunks, babes, stereotypes and clichés. Overstuffed, you might say, but blackly funny and rollicking fun if you don't mind seeing Blake Lively being tortured by Benicio Del Toro. Taylor Kitsch and Aaron Taylor-Johnson play college-buddy marijuana growers who attract the attention of a Mexican cartel. When their girlfriend (Lively) is kidnapped as leverage by Salma Hayek's thugs, it's all on. (2012) ★★★★★

EASTER MONDAY

The Help* (TV2, 8.30pm). The race drama that garnered a lot of Oscar love, but which once again is the story of a white woman's enlightenment rather than a black woman's emancipation. Emma Stone takes the lead as a young university-educated woman in early 60s Mississippi. Her friends, including racist villain Hilly (Bryce Dallas Howard), have "help" and she hits on the idea of writing a book about the maids' lives. Viola Davis and Octavia Spencer (who won a best supporting actress Oscar) are the noble and resigned servants. It's broad strokes for the folks or, as Salon put it, "a white liberal fantasy in historical drag". (2011) ★★★

Source Code* (Prime, 9.35pm). After his acclaimed small-budget debut Moon, here's another small gem from director Duncan Jones, David Bowie's kid, who never wastes a shot or gives his actors unnecessary dialogue. In fact, Listener film reviewer David Larsen described Source Code as a "perfect film"; it's so well put together that the ride is seamless. Jake Gyllenhaal is a confused soldier who wakes up on a train in someone else's body. It emerges that he has a Groundhog-Day eight minutes to work out why the train is going to explode. "A thinking person's thrill ride," said Larsen. (2011) ★★★★★

WEDNESDAY APRIL 8

The Iron Lady* (Prime, 8.35pm). A few brave British actors have taken on Margaret Thatcher – Lindsay Duncan among them – but it was American Meryl Streep who nailed Britain's longest-serving prime minister (and won an Oscar). She's seen as elderly and afflicted by dementia, and in flashbacks to her struggle to break into the male-dominated Tory Party. The centrepiece of the movie is the Falklands War, but as she presides over the most divisive government England had ever known, there's not much sense of the effect she had. "Thatcher without Thatcherism," said the Guardian. (2011) ★★★★★

The Best of the Week

SATURDAY APRIL 4

Greil Marcus (RNZ National, 4.10pm). Chris Bourke converses with cultural critic and author Greil Marcus, "one of the epic figures in rock writing", according to the New York Times. His most recent book is an iconoclastic list of 10 songs and their place in, and effect on, rock'n'roll history. They include To Know Him Is to Love Him, written by Phil Spector in 1958; Money (That's What I Want), by Janie Bradford and Motown founder Berry Gordy; and Guitar Drag by sonic and visual artist Christian Marclay.

EASTER SUNDAY

Spectrum (RNZ National, 12.12pm). The term "vintage" seems to encompass anything from Victorian-style high tea to 1950s bathing costumes, and with crowds of befrocked women about to descend on the Very Vintage Day Out extravaganza in Auckland, Jack Perkins looks into the vintage/retro craze with two enthusiasts. Claire Gormley and Rose Jackson live la vida vintage via both their raiment and their magazine Glory Days.

Young New Zealand (RNZ

Concert, 3.00pm). The first of two programmes covering the Todd Young Composers Awards 2014, in which nine young people were mentored by Victoria Kelly and had the excitement of hearing their works played by the NZSO.

EASTER MONDAY

Messiah (RNZ Concert, noon). A mostly New Zealand line-up in this 2012 recording of Handel's most famous work: tenor Simon O'Neill and singing sisters Madeleine and Anna Pierard are joined by Australian bass-baritone Andrew Collis and conductor Graham Abbott. The Orpheus Choir and the NZSO complete the credits. Hallelujah!

Music Alive (RNZ Concert, 8.00pm). Dutch conductor Edo de Waart is something of a Mahler specialist; he's been conducting the Austrian composer since his twenties and told Eva Radich last year that Mahler's "in his DNA". Here's a recording from August of de Waart in charge of the NZSO performing Mahler's final symphony, the ninth.

WEDNESDAY APRIL 8

Appointment (RNZ Concert, 7.00pm). Shelley Wilkinson and musicologist Samantha Owens present Germans in Maoriland?, a two-part programme about the German influx to New Zealand between the early 1840s and the beginning of World War I – and the bands that followed. Tonight's programme features vintage recordings such as Has Anyone Seen a German Band? from the early 1900s, about a young German woman searching for her sweetheart, a trombonist.

Night Lights Classic Jazz (RNZ National, 11.06pm). The US series looks at Jazz Women of the 1940s, in particular the instrumentalists who had a tough time being accepted. The upheaval of World War II created more opportunities for female musicians, and presenter David Brent Johnson features composer-arranger Mary Lou Williams, trumpeter Billie Rogers, vibraphonist Marjorie Hyams, the International Sweethearts of Rhythm and pianists Hazel Scott and Beryl Booker. ■

Costa Rica was more jovial than us, as was Iceland. For heaven's sake, Iceland? All they can do is fish.

Oh, happy day

It's a sad state of affairs when we're only the 13th happiest land on Earth.

I bet you missed it. Friday, March 20 was International Day of Happiness. New Zealand appeared to ignore the United Nations-declared day to commemorate the pursuit of happiness. I wasn't unhappy about that but it does seem to me that we need to shake up our attitude.

I've been pursuing this contented state for several decades and it's a tricky little sucker to catch up with. There are always worries nagging away. Your job, finances, health or the behaviour of others have a habit of getting between you and that fleeting delight we all seek. Still, the UN recognises how important happiness is: Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon got the day under way with a social media pitch to cheer us up and Pharrell Williams, who joyfully made a fortune with a song about it, told UN delegates that "happiness is your birthright".

Sadly, according to a Gallup poll done a couple of years ago, it may be our birthright but we are slow to seize it, for 12 other countries around the world turn out to be happier than us. New Zealand was only the 13th most happy country in the world. Costa Rica was more jovial about life than us, as was Iceland. For heaven's sake, Iceland? It's freezing there, they're bankrupt and all they can do is fish.

Australia came in ahead of us at 10th. Surely we're happier than the Aussies? They have Tony Abbott, bushfires and a cruel penchant for locking up their refugees in concentration camps. How can Australians be happier than New Zealanders?

We're so gloomy we don't even celebrate International Day of Happiness. Ask a Kiwi how he or she is doing and the usual dry reply will be "Not bad". What's the matter with us? Not bad? Why not "Bloody great!" "Super!" "Fantastic!" Instead, we opt for the blandly neutral.

It's not as if we face wars, riots, grinding poverty or starvation on a daily basis and no one is queuing up to chop your head off as an act of religious devotion. As I write, the biggest New Zealand news story appears to be about two kids who took a joy ride on an airport luggage carousel and are now fighting through the courts to ensure they can overturn a school punishment that banishes them from a rowing event. The country's news editors must weep with the paucity of real news.

Actually, there's another story worth mentioning that claims our spy agency may have eavesdropped on foreigners in an effort to get Trade Minister Tim Groser a new job at the World Trade Organization. It's worth noting two things. First, their failure to get him the role may please Edward Snowden, but it depresses the hell out of me, because if they can't even pull that off, then God help us if we ever face a real terror threat. Second, eavesdropping on foreigners is about as benign as you get in the secret police. In other countries they're busy conducting purges. We should be happy ours is not; but then, of course, we're not as happy as we could be about most things.

We do like a good old-fashioned whinge. I do. I'll whine about Ports of Auckland strangling the harbour with its wharf extensions and fume at an impotent mayor who shrugs it off. But that doesn't mean I can't be happy about everything else. When you think about it, one of the reasons we don't want to see any more of the harbour reclaimed is that we're happy with the Waitemata as it is.

It's all a matter of attitude. And so, New Zealand, I want to see us moving up the world happiness index in the next survey. Keep calm and stay happy. ■
